Mr. McFarland says that a good pratice in driving is to make use of the band brake occasionally, instead of the foot brake By doing this, he says, the service brake is saved and kept in working condition for an emergency. In case of cars having the brake mounted with the clutch. care should be taken to keep the brake clean. Otherwise there will be dragging and loss of power.

The peril awaiting the driver with poor brakes is well known and right now at the opening of the motoring season is a good time to set the brakes in rder. Both the hand and foot brakes should be kept working so that should one fail the other may be depended upon.

U.S. Leads World in Unique Industry

AMERICAN MUSSEL FISHERIES PROTECTED BY GOVERNMENT

Shore outfit, sorting table and shells ready for sale.

Dip net used in taking fresh water mussels from the Mississippi River.

Herbert C. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce.

America made fresh water pearl buttons a common necessity for the people of all nations. According to a statement just issued by Herbert Hoover, Secretary of the Department of Commerce, the United States has taken definite steps to protect the lead it has always maintained throughout the world in this unique industry. To this end the Department of Commerce, through the Bureau of Fisheries, will this year extensively develop the fresh water mussel fishing beds of many inland rivers.

"It was only thirty years ago," Secretary Hoover stated, "that the business interests centering around the fresh water mussel resources of the United States came to assume the proportions of an important national industry. Factories for the manufacture of fresh water pearl buttons sprang up in towns along the Mississippi river. With improved machinery and methods, further expansion has occurred until last year many million gross of buttons were manufactured in this country.

Location of Fishing Beds

"Coincident with the rise of this industry, there developed an important and widespread fishery, employing thousands of persons and affecting people and communities of varied occupations. Commencing on the Mississippi river, the fishing gradually spread until it embraced practically the entire Mississippi basin and a portion of the Great Lakes drainage from Minnesota to Louisiana, north and south, and from Ohio and West Virginia and Tennessee on the East to Arkansas, Kansas and South Dakota on the West.

Artificial Propagation

"Under the protection of the United States government methods for the propagation of these fresh water mussels have been developed at the biological station at Fairport, Ia. During the winter of 1922 mussel propagation was carried on by the government on an extensive scale in connection with the rescue of 139,173,780 fish in the Mississippi river basin. When the water recedes after an overflow fish in great numbers are left in ponds and stagnant pools. Workers from rescue stations return these fish to flowing waters, and as they toss them back into the stream they are infected with the spawn of mussels. It takes these mussels about seven years to become full grown. This work insures an unlimited supply of fresh water mussels in the United States for years to come.

Billions of Buttons

"Muscatine, Ia., where the first fresh water pearl buttons were made in 1891, is still headquarters for the shell industry of this country. Shells are cut into button blanks in factories located near the fisheries where they are found. Billions of buttons are manufactured in this country every year.

"The industry employs 30,000 people and is peculiarly a product of this country, both because of its origin and the universal use of pearl buttons in this country today."

CONSERVATION AIDS FARMER

Government Shows How to Salvage Meat and Shells of Mussels for Farm Use.

FOOD FISHES ALSO RESCUED

Simple Process Turns Waste Products of Mussels Into Good Fertilizer, Hog Food and Chicken Feed.

The farmers of this country will receive direct benefit from recent experiments conducted by the government in conserving the waste products of American mussel fisheries, according to a report recently issued by one of the bureaus in the Department of Agriculture.

Crushed mussel shells, from middle western streams, have been shown to be the equal of crushed oyster shells as a source of lime for laying hens.

The greatest industry connected with the mussel resources of this country is that centering around fresh water pearl shells. Thousands of dollars can now be saved annually by the production of poultry grit from the waste left after the shell has been cut for button blanks. Defective or broken blanks are put ino a huge crusher, and the resulting dust has been found useful as an ingredient for stock food for hogs, as well as poultry.

Another important result of recent experiments showed that mussel meats may be used for fertilizer and also hog food. At the experiment station of the Bureau of Fisheries at Fairport, Iowa, ground mussel meats have been found to be acceptable to chickens when moistened to make a mash and mixed with grain. Dry mussel meats are a suitable food for chickens, having about the same value as fish meal.

Last year the Bureau of Fisheries rescued approximately 140,000,000 fish from the overflow waters of the Mississippi valley streams. The food value of these fishes was estimated at over $6,000,000.

ARL FISHERIES FORM UNIQUE INDUSTRY

Women Important Factors in Novel Occupations Centering Around Rivers in Mississippi Valley.

The pearl fisheries of this country are opening up new occupations for women. Eight thousand women are now said to be engaged in industries centering around the taking of fresh water shells from the rivers of the Mississippi valley.

American women in increasing numbers are being drawn into the work of pearling and shelling. They not only take the shells from the waters in their search for pearls, but they know how to carefully cook out the mussel meats and sort the shells that are suitable for the manufacture of pearl buttons.

Travelers along the rivers of middle western states often see women attending the vats in which they cook the mussels in order to remove the meats from the shells. These vats are crude, cast iron affairs, heated by driftwood fires.

Women Expert Operators

The first factory to make fresh water pearl buttons was opened in Muscatine in 1891, and this city is still headquarters for the industry. Women and girls do many different types of work. They do the grinding by which the rough bark of a shell is removed, and they are skillful operators of the automatic machines.

Home Work a Feature

One very important feature of the unique industry which has grown up around the fresh water mussel fisheries of this country is the work that can be done by women in their own homes. The placing of buttons on cards gives occupation to hundreds of women. The city of Muscatine has long been accustomed to the sight of women with their many little telescope grips, which carry buttons to and from the factories. The sorting and grading of buttons is distinctly a feminine occupation.

ROOSTER CAUSES EGG LOSS

Swat Him After June 1 and Save Money

Since 1910, when the loss from bad eggs due to fertility was estimated at $5,000,000 for the state of Iowa, increased attention by the farmers to removing roosters from the poultry flock has cut this loss almost in two, according to HA. Bittenbender. head of the poultry husbandry department of Iowa State College.

"As soon as the hatching season is over, or not later than June 1, all male birds should be sold," says Mr. Bittenbender. The quicked the roosters are sold theh igher price received for them will be, as later most people will sell their roosters, which will lower the prices.

By stating the "swatting" of the rooster at the end of the hatching season, June 1, enough ime will be allowed for the production of fertile egs for hatching. Mr. Bittenbender says that fertility will be strong for seven days after the roosters have been removed, then it will decrease. By the end of three weeks all traces of fertiliity will have dissappeared.

A fertile egg kept at 101 degrees for 48 hours will form a blood ring, thus eliminating its use in the market. For this reason farmers should see that the eggs are gathered each day and that all brooding hens are shut up.

CARE FOR WATERMELLON?

Kleckly Sweet Best Home- Grown Kind for Iowa

No matter how big or how juicy, there is never a watermellon on the mraket that comes up to the one which was grown in the consumer's own back yard. The consumer will tell you that.

But to have the home- gromn watermelons to eat, watermellon seed must be planted and now is the time to do it. Two of the arlier varieties for Iowa are Cole's Early and the Ford Hook Early. A melon coming still later. but which is probably best suited for home consumption under Iowa conditions, is the Kleckly Sweet. It may be grown anywhere in the state and is recognized as the leading variety for home use. Due to its comparatively thin rind, it is not so well adapted for shipping as the Tom Watson, altho each year many of them are shipped out of the state under the name of Monte Christo.

The leading commercial melon for Iowa is the Tom Watson. It has a heavy rind and for this reason is especially suitable for hauling and shipping. As high as 1,500 carloads of these melons have been loaded at Iowa points in a season. For home use, however, it must take a back seat to the Kleckly Sweet.

The world is pretty well divided into early birds and early yorms. It's up to you whether you will be a bird or a worm.

Also a chicken in the pot is worth several birds in the hand.

The bitter truth is that some of the "sweet girl" graduates are not that way around the house.

The absent minded Klemme man surveyed himself in the hair brush instead of the mirror.

"Gracious but I need a shave," he mused.

"Chase threatened you, then?" asked and the forced naturalness of voice struck Belding.

"Threatened me? He made my life nightmare," replied Nell, in a rush speech. "He got so half the time, he was drunk, he didn't want or me to be his wife. I was about to give up and go mad when you came home."

As he released her she glanced kly up at him, then lifted appealing hands.

"Dick, you won't hunt for him—go after him?"

Gale laughed, and the laugh made Belding jump.

"Dick, I cannot keep you back?"

"No," he said.

Then the woman in her burst through instinctive fear, and with her eyes blazing black in her white face she lifted parted quivering lips and kissed him.

Gale left the patio, and Belding followed closely at his heels. They went through the sitting-room. Outside upon the porch sat the rangers, Mr. Gale, and Thorne. Dick went into his room without speaking.

"Shore somethin's comin' off," said Ladd, sharply; and he sat up with his keen eyes narrowing.

Belding spoke a few words; and, remembering an impression he had wished to make upon Mr. Gale, he made them strong.

"Better stop that boy," he concluded, looking at Mr. Gale. "He'll do some mischief. He's wilder'n h—l."

Just then Dick came out of his door. "Richard, where are you going?" asked his father.

"I'm going to beat a dog."

Then Dick strode off the porch.

"Hold on!" Ladd's voice would have stopped almost any man. "Dick, you wasn't agoin' without me?"

"Yes, I was. But I'm thoughtless just now, Laddy."

"Shore you was. Wait a minute, Dick. I'm a sick man, but at that nobody can pull any stunts round here without me."

He hobbled along the porch and went into his room. Jim Lash knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and, humming his dance tune, he followed Ladd. In a moment the rangers appeared, and both were packing guns.

"Where will we find these Chases?" asked Dick of Belding.

"They've got a place down the road adjoining the inn. They call it their club. At this hour Radford will be there sure. I don't know about the old man. But his office is now just across the way."

They passed several houses, turned a corner into the main street, and stopped at a wide, low adobe structure. The place was a hall, and needed only a bar to make it a saloon. A large table near a window was surrounded by a noisy, smoking, drinking circle of card-players.

"Point out this Radford Chase to me," said Gale.

"There! The big fellow with the red face. His eyes stick out a little. See! He's dropped his cards and his face isn't red any more."

Dick strode across the room. His heavy boot shot up, and with a crash the table split, and glasses, cards, chips flew everywhere. As they rattled down and the chairs of the dumfounded players began to slide Dick called out: "My name is Gale. I'm looking for Mr. Radford Chase."

A tall, heavy-shouldered fellow rose, boldly enough, even swaggeringly and glowered at Gale.

"I'm Radford Chase," he said. His voice betrayed the boldness of his action.

It was over in a few moments. The tables and chairs were tumbled into a heap; a pool table had been shoved aside; a lamp lay shattered, with oil running dark upon the floor. Ladd leaned against a post with a smoking gun in his hand. A Mexican crouched close to the wall moaning over a broken arm. In the far corner upheld by comrades another wounded Mexican cried out in pain. These two had attempted to draw weapons upon Gale, and Ladd had crippled them.

In the center of the room lay Radford Chase, a limp, torn, hulking, bloody figure. He was not seriously injured. But he was helpless, a miserable beaten wretch, who knew his condition and felt the eyes upon him. He sobbed and moaned and howled. But no one offered to help him to his feet.

Backed against the door of the hall stood Ben Chase, for once stripped of all authority and confidence and courage. Dick Gale confronted him. He shook a huge gloved fist in Chase's face.

"Your gray hairs save you this time. But keep out of my way! And when that son of yours comes to, tell him every time I meet him I'll add some more to what he got today!"

CHAPTER XIX

The Secret of Forlorn River.

In the early morning Gale, seeking solitude where he could brood over his trouble, wandered alone. It was not easy for him to elude the Yaqui, and just at the moment when he had cast himself down in a secluded shady corner the Indian appeared, noiseless, shadowy, mysterious as always.

The Indian had been told of the loses sustained by Belding and his rangers.

"Go—me!" and Yaqui, with an impressive gesture toward the lofty lilac-colored steps of No Name mountains.

He seemed the same as usual, but a glance on Gale's part, a moment's attention, made him conscious of the old strange force in the Yaqui.

"Why does my brother want me to climb the nameless mountains with him?" asked Gale.

"Lluvia d'oro," replied Yaqui, and he made motions that Gale found difficult of interpretation.

"Shower of Gold," translated Gale. That was the Yaqui's name for Nell. What did he mean by using it in connection with a climb into the mountains? Were his motions intended to convey an idea of a shower of golden blossoms from that rare and beautiful tree, or a golden rain? Gale's listlessness vanished in a flash of thought. The Yaqui meant gold! Gold! He meant he could retrieve the fallen fortunes of the white brother who had saved his life that evil day at the Papago well. Gale thrilled as he gazed piercingly into the wonderful eyes of this Indian. Would Yaqui never consider his debt paid?

"Go—me?" repeated the Indian, pointing with the singular directness that always made this action remarkable in him.

"Yes, Yaqui."

Gale ran to his rom, put on hobnailed boots, filled a canteen and hurried back to the corral. Yaqui awaited him. The Indian carried a coiled lasso and a short stout stick. Without a word he led the way down the lane, turned up the river toward the mountains. None of Belding's household saw their departure.

What had once been only a narrow mesquite-bordered trail was now a well-trodden road. A deep irrigation ditch, full of flowing muddy water, ran parallel with the road. Gale had been curious about the operations of the Chases, but a bitterness he could not help had kept him from going out to see the work. He was not surprised to find that the engineers who had constructed the ditches and dam had anticipated him in every particular. The dammed-up gulch made a magnificent reservoir, and Gale could not look upon the long narrow lake without a feeling of gladness. The dreaded anosco of the Mexicans might come again and would come, but never to the inhabitants of Forlorn River. That stone-walled, stone-floored gulch would never leak, and already it contained water enough to irrigate the whole of Altar valley for two dry seasons.

Yaqui led swiftly along the lake to the upper end, where the stream roared down over unscalable walls. This point was the farthest Gale had ever penetrated into the rough foothills, and he had Belding's word for it that no white man had ever climbed No Name mountains from the west.

The Indian left the gulch and clambered up over a jumble of weathered slides and traced a slow course along the base of the giant wall. He looked up and seemed to select a point for ascent. It was the last place in that mountain side where Gale would have thought climbing possible. Before him the wall rose, leaning over him, shutting out the light, a dark mighty mountain mass. Innumerable cracks and crevices and caves roughened the bulging sides of dark rock.

Yaqui tied one end of his lasso to the short, stout stick and, carefully disentangling the coils, he whirled the stick round and round and threw it almost over the first rim of the shelf, perhaps thirty feet up. The stick did not lodge. Yaqui tried again. This time it caught in a crack. He pulled hard. Then, holding to the lasso, he walked up the steep slant, hand over hand on the rope. When he reached the shelf he motioned for Gale to follow. Gale found that method of scaling a wall both quick and easy. Yaqui pulled up the lasso, and threw the stick aloft into another crack. He climbed to another shelf, and Gale followed him. The third effort brought them to a more rugged bench a hundred feet above the slides. The Yaqui worked round to the left and turned into a dark fissure. Gale kept close at his heels. They came out presently into lighter space, yet one that restricted any extended view. Broken sections of cliff were on all sides.

Here the ascent became toil. Gale could distance Yaqui going downhill; on the climb, however, he was hard put to it to keep the Indian in sight. It was not a question of strength or lightness of foot. These Gale had beyond the share of most men. It was a matter of lung power, and the Yaqui's life had been spent scaling the desert heights. Moreover, the climbing was infinitely slow, tedious, dangerous. On the way up several times Gale imagined he heard a dull roar of falling water. The sound seemed to be under him, over him, to this side and to that. When he was certain he could locate the direction from which it came then he heard it no more until he had gone on. Gradually he forgot it in the physical sensations of the climb. He burned his hands and knees. He grew hot and wet and winded. His heart thumped so that it hurt, and there were instants when his sight was blurred. When at last he had toiled to where the Yaqui sat awaiting him upon the rim of that great wall, it was none too soon.

Gale lay back and rested for a while without note of anything except the blue sky. Then he sat up. He was amazed to find that after that wonderful climb he was only a thousand feet or so above the valley. Judged by the nature of his effort, he would have said he had climbed a mile. The village lay beneath him, with its new adobe structures and tents and buildings in bright contrast with the older habitations. He saw the green alfalfa fields, and Belding's white horses, looking very small and motionless. He pleased himself by imagining he could pick out Blanco Sol. Then his gaze swept on to the river.

Indeed, he realized now why some one had named it Forlorn river. Even at this season when it was full of water it had a forlorn aspect. It was doomed never to mingle with the waters of the Gulf. It wound away down the valley, growing wider and shallower, encroaching more and more on the gray flats, until it disappeared on its sad journey toward Sonoyta. That vast shimmering, sun-governed waste recognized its life only at this flood season, and was already with parched tongue and insatiate fire licking and burning up its futile waters.

Yaqui put a hand on Gale's knee. It was a bronzed, scarred, powerful hand, always eloquent of meaning. The Indian was listening. His bent head, his strange dilating eyes, his rigid form, and that close-pressing hand, how these brought back to Gale the terrible lonely night hours on the lava!

"What do you hear, Yaqui?" asked Gale. He laughed a little at the mood that had come over him. But the sound of his voice did not break the spell. He did not want to speak again. He yielded to Yaqui's subtle nameless influence. He listened himself, heard nothing but the scream of an eagle. Often he wondered if the Indian could hear things that made no sound. Yaqui was beyond understanding.

Whatever the Indian had listened to or for, presently he satisfied himself, and, with a grunt that might mean anything, he rose and turned away from the rim. Gale followed, rested now and eager to go on. He saw that the great cliff they had climbed was only a stairway up to the huge looming dark bulk of the plateau above.

Suddenly he again heard the dull roar of falling water. It seemed to have cleared itself of muffled vibrations. Yaqui mounted a little ridge and halted. The next instant Gale stood above a bottomless cleft into which a white stream leaped. His astounded gaze swept backward along this narrow swift stream to its end in a dark, round, boiling pool. It was a huge spring, a bubbling well, the outcropping of an underground river coming down from the vast plateau above.

Yaqui had brought Gale to the source of Forlorn river.

Flashing thoughts in Gale's mind were no swifter than the thrills that ran over him. He would stake out a claim here and never be cheated out of it. Ditches on the benches and troughs on the steep walls would carry water down to the valley. Ben Chase had built a great dam which would be useless if Gale chose to turn Forlorn river from its natural course. The fountain head of that mysterious desert river belonged to him.

His eagerness, his mounting passion, was checked by Yaqui's unusual action. The Indian showed wonder, hesitation, even reluctance. His strange eyes surveyed this boiling well as if they could not believe the sight they saw. Gale divined instantly that Yaqui had never before seen the source of Forlorn river. If he had ever ascended to this plateau, probably it had been to some other part, for the water was new to him. He stood gazing aloft at peaks, at lower rampants of the mountain, and at nearer landmarks of prominence. Yaqui seemed at fault. He was not sure of his location.

Then he strode past the swirling pool of dark water and began to ascend a little slope that led up to a shelving cliff. Another object halted the Indian. It was a pile of stones, weathered, crumbled, fallen into ruin, but still retaining shape enough to prove it had been built there by the hands of men. Round and round this the Yaqui stalked, and his curiosity attested a further uncertainty. It was as if he had come upon something surprising. Gale wondered about the pile of stones. Had it once been a prospector's claim?

"Ugh!" grunted the Indian; and, though his exclamation expressed no satisfaction, it surely put an end to doubt. He pointed up to the roof of the sloping yellow shelf of stone. Faintly outlined there in red were the imprints of many human hands with fingers spread wide. Gale had often seen such paintings on the walls of the desert caverns. Manifestly these told Yaqui he had come to the spot for which he had aimed.

Then his actions became swift—and Yaqui seldom moved swiftly. The fact impressed Gale. The Indian searched the level floor under the shelf. He gathered up handfuls of small black stones, and he thrust them at Gale. Their weight made Gale start, and then he trembled. The Indian's next move was to pick up a piece of weathered rock and throw it against the wall. It broke. He snatched up parts, and showed the broken edges to Gale. They contained yellow streaks, dull glints, faint tracings of green. It was gold.

Gale found his legs shaking under him; and he sat down, trying to take all the bits of stone into his lap. His fingers were all thumbs as with knife blade he dug into the black pieces of rock. He found gold. Then he stared down the slope, down into the valley with its river winding forlornly away into the desert. But he did not see any of that. Here was reality as sweet, as wonderful, as saving as a dream come true. Yaqui had led him to a ledge of gold. Gale had learned enough about mineral to know that this was a rich strike. All in a second he was speechless with the joy of it. But his mind whirled in thought about this strange and noble Indian, who seemed never to be able to pay a debt. Belding and the poverty that had come to him! Nell, who had wept over the loss of a spring! Laddy, who never could ride again! Jim Lash, who swore he would always look after his friend! Thorne and Mercedes! All these people, who had been good to him and whom he loved, were poor. But now they would be rich. They would one and all be his partners. He had discovered the source of Forlorn river, and was rich in water. Yaqui had made him rich in gold. Gale wanted to rush down the slope, down into the valley, and tell his wonderful news.

Suddenly his eyes cleared and he saw the pile of stones. His blood turned to ice, then to fire. That was the mark of a prospector's claim. But it was old, very old. The ledge had never been worked. The slope was wild. There was not another single indication that a prospector had ever been there. Where, then, was he who had first staked this claim? Gale wondered with growing hope, with the fire easing, with the cold passing.

The Yaqui uttered the low, strange, involuntary cry so rare with him, a cry somehow always associated with death. Gale shuddered.

The Indian was digging in the sand and dust under the shelving wall. He threw out an object that rang against the stone. It was a belt buckle. He threw out old shrunken, withered boots. He came upon other things, and then he ceased to dig.

The grave of desert prospectors! Gale had seen more than one. Ladd had told him many a story of such gruesome finds. It was grim, hard fact.

Then the keen-eyed Yaqui reached up to a little projecting shelf of rock and took from it a small object. He showed no curiosity and gave the thing to Gale.

How strangely Gale felt when he received into his hands a flat oblong box! Was it only the influence of the Yaqui, or was there a nameless and unseen presence beside that grave? Gale could not be sure. But he knew he had gone back to the old desert mood. He knew something hung in the balance. No accident, no luck, no debt-paying Indian could account wholly for that moment. Gale knew he held in his hands more than gold.

The box was a tin one, and not at all rusty. Gale pried open the reluctant lid. A faint old musty odor penetrated his nostrils. Inside the box lay a packet wrapped in what once might have been oilskin. He took it out and removed this covering. A folded paper remained in his hands.

It was growing yellow with age. But he described a dim tracery of words. A crabbed scrawl, written in blood, hard to read! He held it more to the light, and slowly he deciphered its contents:

"We, Robert Burton and Jonas Warren, give half of this gold claim to the man who finds it and half to Nell Burton, daughter and granddaughter."

Gasping, with a bursting heart, overwhelmed by an unutterable joy of divination, Gale fumbled with the paper until he got it open.

It was a certificate twenty-one years old, and recorded the marriage of Robert Burton and Nellie Warren.

CHAPTER XX.

Desert Gold.

A summer day dawned on Forlorn River, a beautiful, still, hot, golden day with huge sail clouds of white motionless over No Name peaks and the purple of clear air in the distance along the desert horizon.

Mrs. Belding returned that day to find her daughter happy and the past buried forever in two lonely graves. The haunting shadow left her eyes. Gale believed he would never forget the sweetness, the wonder, the passion of her embrace when she called him her boy and gave him her blessing.

The little wrinkled padre who married Gale and Nell performed the ceremony as he told his beads, without interest or penetration, and went his way, leaving happiness behind.

"Shore I was a sick man," Ladd said, "an' darn near a dead one, but I'm agoin' to get well. Mebbe I'll be able to ride again some day. Nell, I lay it to you. An' I'm agoin' to kiss you an' wish you all the joy there is in this world. An' Dick, as Yaqui says, she's shore your Shower of Gold."

He spoke of Gale's finding love—spoke of it with the deep and wistful feeling of the lonely ranger who had always yearned for love and had never known it. Belding, once more practical, and important as never before with mining projects and water claims to manage, spoke of Gale's great good fortune in the finding of gold—he called it desert gold.

"Ah, yes. Desert Gold!" exclaimed Dick's father, softly, with eyes of pride. Perhaps he was glad Dick had found the rich claim; surely he was happy that Dick had won the girl he loved. But it seemed to Dick himself that his father meant something very different from love and fortune in his allusion to desert gold.

Yaqui came to Dick to say goodby. Dick was startled, grieved, and in his impulsiveness forgot for a moment the nature of the Indian. Yaqui was not to be changed.

Belding tried to overload him with gifts. The Indian packed a bag of food, a blanket, a gun, a knife, a canteen, and no more. The whole household went out with him to the corrals and fields from which Belding bade him choose a horse—any horse, even the loved Blanco Diable. Gale's heart was in his throat for fear the Indian might choose Blanco Sol, and he hated himself for a selfishness he could not help. But without a word he would have parted with the treasured Sol.

Yaqui whistled the horses up—for the last time. Did he care for them? It would have been hard to say. He never looked at the fierce and haughty Diablo, nor at Blanco Sol as he raised his noble head and rang his piercing blast. The Indian did not choose one of Belding's whites. He caught a lean and wiry broncho, strapped a blanket on him, and fastened on the pack.

Then he turned to these friends, the same emotionless, inscrutable dark and silent Indian that he had always been.

He shook hands with the men, swept a dark fleeting glance over Nell, and rested his strange eyes upon Mercedes' beautiful and agitated face. It must have been a moment of intense feeling for the Spanish girl. She owed it to him that she had life and love and happiness. She held out those speaking slender hands. But Yaqui did not touch them. Turning away, he mounted the broncho and rode down the trail toward the river.

"He's going home," said Belding.

"Home!" whispered Ladd; and Dick knew the ranger had felt the resurging tide of memory. Home—across the cactus and lava, through solemn lonely days, the silent, lonely nights, into the vast and red-hazed world of desolation.

"Thorne, Mercedes, Nell, let's climb the foothill yonder and watch him out of sight," said Dick.

They climbed while the others returned to the house. When they reached the summit of the hill Yaqui was riding up the far bank of the river.

"He will turn to look—to wave goodby?" asked Nell.

"Dear, he is an Indian," replied Gale.

From the height they watched him ride through the mesquites, up over the river bank to enter the cactus. His mount showed dark against the green and white, and for a long time he was plainly in sight. The sun hung red in a golden sky. The last the watchers saw of Yaqui was when he rode across a ridge and stood silhouetted against the gold of desert sky—a wild, lonely, beautiful picture. Then he was gone.

Strangely it came to Gale then that he was glad. Yaqui had returned to his own—the great spaces, the desolation, the solitude—to the trails he had trodden when a child, trails haunted now by ghosts of his people, and ever by his gods. Gale realized that in the Yaqui he had known the spirit of the desert, that this spirit had claimed all which was wild and primitive in him.

Tears glistened in Mercedes' magnificent black eyes, and Thorne kissed them away.

That action recalled Gale's earlier mood, the joy of the present, and he turned to Nell's sweet face. The desert was there, wonderful, constructive, ennobling, beautiful, terrible, but it was not for him as it was for the Indian. In the light of Nell's tremulous returning smile that strange, deep, clutching shadow faded, lost its hold forever; and he leaned close to her, whispering: "Lluvia d'oro"—"Shower of Gold."

LEGION MAN IS AN AUTHOR

"Rainbow Bright" Is From the Pen of Lawrence Stewart of Des Moines; Also an Artist.

A "buck private" during the World war, Lawrence O. Stewart, American Legion member of Des Moines, is now obtaining recognition as a writer, painter and sculptor.

Stewart is the author of "Rainbow Bright," an informal history of the Forty-second division, with which he served in France as a private in the sanitary detachment of the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth infantry. Illustrations for the book are leaves torn from the sketch book which Stewart carried in his gas mask. They were prepared oftentimes under fire. A preface for the book has been written by Col. E. R. Bennett, who commanded the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth infantry in action.

Stewart is a graduate of the Chicago Art institute in painting and sculpture, and also studied at the Beaux Arts in New York. He was an instructor in painting and modeling at Drake university for a year and a half prior to the war and now has a studio in Des Moines.

His work includes a bronze bust of the late Henry Wallace, father of the present secretary of agriculture. He is now making a bust of Lincoln for the new Abraham Lincoln high school building in Des Moines.

FOR THEIR BUDDIES' GRAVES

Disabled Men in Oteen (N. C.) Hospital Contribute in Remembrance of Fallen Comrades.

Disabled veterans, who have spent long years in an effort to regain their health shattered by World war service, remember their fallen comrades who lie in "Flanders Fields."

Accompanying a tin box containing money for the American Legion's endowment fund to provide for the decoration of the graves of overseas dead, came a note from ex-service men in ward 1-3 of United States hospital at Oteen, N. C., as follows:

"National Treasurer, American Legion:

"Enclosed you will find the mite contributed by the boys of ward 1-3 of this hospital. Each coin dropped into this little box was dropped with the remembrance of the boys who fell, our buddies, and the least we feel we can do is to wish for their graves to be kept green.

And the thought we send across the wave
As we lie upon our cot,
Is to plant upon each far-off grave
One sweet forget-me-not.

Proceeds of the Legion's endowment fund will insure that the graves of 32,000 veterans in Europe will be decorated each Memorial day.

HERRICK LAUDS FUND PLAN

Ambassador to France Endorses Legion's Campaign to Provide for Decoration of Graves.

Myron T. Herrick, American ambassador to France, recently wrote American Legion national headquarters in Indianapolis endorsing the Legion's campaign to raise a fund to provide for the decoration of 32,000 graves of war dead overseas each Memorial day.

"This delicate and kindly thought of the American Legion in assuming the responsibility for the appropriate decoration of the graves of the American soldiers in France has received the universal and grateful approval of the families, relatives and friends of its dead comrades," Ambassador Herrick stated. "It is an assurance of permanency and efficiency in the outward remembrance of our honored dead. Also, it is a comforting thought that the graves of our boys who sleep in the fields of France, where they fought and died have become the sacred trust of their living comrades, the Legionnaires."

Similar messages of approval for the campaign have been received by the Legion from General Pershing and Secretary of War Weeks.

An Even Chance.

Hogan was tired of the city and wanted to move out to the great open spaces where men are men and all that sort of thing. Accordingly, he sought information from a friend.

"Clancy," he said, "ye've taken a homestead, so ye know all about it. Will ye be tellin' me th' law about goin' about it?"

"Well," said Clancy, "I'm not afther rememberin' the letter of th' law, but here's what it amounts to. Th' guvviment is willin' to bet ye wan hundred an' sixty acres of land agin' $14 that ye can't live on it five years without starvin' to death."—American Legion Weekly.

We got in a new double tub washing machine the other day. and say if you don't think its about the niftiest thing you ever saw its because you have seen something a lot better than anybody that has seen this one yet. It sure is a daisy. Swinging wringer, tubs driven from below, a quiet running. There isn't a bit of machinery on the covers of the tubs, they fit down perfectly tight, nothing to catch the clothes of he operator, nothing to tear and jerk the covers loose. Its sure some machine and the next time you are in town just drop in and look at it, if you intend to buy or not you will enjoy to see how it works, we have it all coupled to an engine ready to go.

—S—

Another thing we have a mighty good lineup of is cultivators, and while you are in looking around just take a slant at a few of these machines. Single row, pivot axle, balance riders, hammock seats, two-rows with and without tongue truck. anything you could wish for, and each is of the best in its class. Hired help is scarce, and two-row cultivators are cheap. abkout two months wages Look em over.

NEWS OF THE WEEK'S DOINGS AT HIGH SCHOOL

RAIN MAN NOT FAVORABLE TO BASEBALL

Thornton Game Postponed and Meservey Game Called on Account of Rain

KLEMME BEATS MESERVEY 20-1

Although the weather. no doubt has been favorable to the farmers of the vicinity, we cannot say that the baseball squad has ben overjoyed with the rains which generally occur ond Fridays or Mondays

Last Friday when the Klemme boys were all set to get beat by or beat Thornton, about nine o'clock it began to rain and continued to do so until about three o'clock when the sun began to shine Of course it was too wet and too late to play then and so the game was postponed until a later date.

Monday the Base ball team journeyed to Meservey to play their High school team. Owing to the weather only two innings could be played. The game was not exciting as it was too one-sided. The Klemme boys pounded the ball over the field and went around the diamond so many times that our score keeper was about the hardest working one on the field. In the first inning the Klemme boys went around about two and a half times on their batting list and scored 18 times. Wellemeyer started the ball to rolling by being the birst one up to bat and hiting a clean home run.

Other home runs were made during the game, When the game was over or called in the second inning the game stood 20 to 1 in favor of Klemme. Meservey conceded the the game to us. It is doubtful how the game would have stood at the end of the seven innings if the playing had continued as it did in the first of the game, (at this rate would have been about 70 to 5).

Gimer and Elder were the battery for Klemme. The Meservey bunch changed their battery continually, but could not stop our team from pounding the "pill" around the field.

..Goodell, Friday

Next Friday , (Tomorrow the base ball team will go to Goodell to play a return game with their team. This game is to be played at West Twin Lake. The Klemme team has a good chance of winning this game, because we beat them in the first game by a score of 27 to 9, and Goodell has not made a big record since that time. Here's hoping the Klemme boys play a real game and let Goodell know that Klemme is on the map.

..It is not exactly known when the postponed game with Thornton will be played, but it will probably come off on next Monday or Tuesday or May 21 or 22.

Girls Make Candy

Last Friday, because it rained and the school wanted something to do to break the monotony of school life Prfessor Neese gave some of the girls, namely, Dolores Koerner, Marie Blank, Leona Lau and Neota Ridder permission to go down in the domestic science kitchen and make candy for the High School. The candy was very good and we will tell all and the boys in particular, that they are good cooks. The candy was served at the close of the school hours and every one did ample justice to it. We are hoping that we may enjoy this treat again some time. It is understood that the boys are going to pay for the materials used in making the candy.

Contracter Here Tuesday

Last Tuesday a Contracter from Ventura was here to figure the job which the school board was letting for the new addition. We don't believe that this man received the job but that it went to a man in Mason City.

Miss McKahan Reads

In conection with the study of the great war in the history class, Miss McKahan has ben reading to them out of the daily papers of the date when the war was in progress. This not only makes the study more interesting, but also makes the study more effective as the papers relate the history of the war in a different way than the history text books.

Tests Come Next Week

Next wek the final examinations come. Every one is preparing for them and are worrying if they will pass or not. Miss McKahan has posted the examination schedule and next Monday the names of those who will be exempt from tests will be posted. The examinations will take place Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. They will be conducted during the mornings and in the after noon the papers will be corrected and the grades made out.

Plans Being Made for Big Picnic

Plans are being made for the biggest school picnic that has ever been held in Klemme. The Junior girls and women faculty of the school are working out the menu and are going to do the soliciting for the picnic.. They will probably call at your home in the near future.

The picnic will be held, as usual at Koerner's grove in the northwest part of town. This is an ideal place for such an event and the school has held their picnics there for a great number of years.

..In the afternoon comes the big baseball game of the season., when Crystal Lake will cross bats with the Klemme team. This promises to be a very interesting game and will be one in which you will lose a great deal if you do not attend. When Crystal Lake played Klemme at the County Tournament the game was a close one and came near to spelling defeat for Klemme, but finally ended in a score of eight for Crystal Lake and eleven for Klemme.

Be sure to come out! It will be the last time you will get to see the team of '23 work

DON'T FAIL TO MISS IT!

Estimates of mortality of live stock in Iowa during the year ending May 1 1923 indicate 13 horses in every thousand head died from disease This is 4 head per thousand below the mortality for last year. The 10 year figure for the United States is 18.3 head per thousand.

Active campaigns against disease in cattle are partly accountable for holding down the mortality of cattle In Iowa for the past year to 15 head per thousand. which is 5 less than the mortality for a year ago, and is still under the 10 year average of -8 head per thousand.

Mortality of cattle due to exposure is reported to be the same as last year, which is 5 head in every thousand. Sheep have died from disease at the rate of 26 head in every thousand and 13 head from exposure. The spring lambs suffered considerably from disease and exposure this year. It is estimated that 60 lambs in every thousand died this spring compared with 50 head for last year and 46 head in the 10 year average.

Hog production has been very heavy and is still in a stage of expansion. Iowa farms had 10 per cent more breeding sows on April 1, 1923 than a year previous. The loss of spring pigs has been reported quite heavy, but it is doubtful if the mortality is any greater than that caused by disease and exposure during the previous spring. It is estimated that the 1923 Spring pig crop was produced with an average of 6 pigs per litter. During the past winter more pounds of pork products were produced than in any previous winter in history, amounting to 30 per cent increase ove the preceding year.

The average number of hogs butchered on Iowa farms in 1922 was 3.6 hogs per farm. Using the figure for total farms in Iowa, 213,-439 as given by the 1920 United States Census, this would indicate a total of 768,000 hogs slaughtered on Iowa farms in 1922.

In her seventeenth year she came to America in the company of a number of near relatives. In 1873 she was united in marriage to Philip Ell at Garner, Iowa. This union was blessed with seven children, two having died in infancy.

Minn.; Herman, Leslie, and Leo Ell of Mason City, Iowa; and a number of grandchildren. many relatives and friends.

Grandma Ell was a kind, Godfearing, loving mother with a sterling Christian character and will be sorely missed.

At 9 o'clock Sunday morning a brief service was conducted at the home by her late pastor, Rev. Belden Weikel of the Olivet Methodist Episcopal Church, at Mason City, after which the body was removed to Klemme where the services were continued in the Methodist Episcopal Church by the Rev. A. B. Gedye, pastor of the Klemme church. The sermon was preached by Rev. Weikel.

OBITUARY—HERMAN LUDEKE

Herman Frederick Ludeke was born in Stephenson Co, Illinois, September 10, 1854. Born into a Christian home, he early in life had the privileges of a Christian training. This in turn prepared him for an early convertion and uniting with the church. He loved the Word of God and often remarked that he believed every word of it. He knew its influence upon the lives of the young and therefore established and maintained the family alter.

On the 12th day of March. 1874, he was united in marriage with Martha Venekolt. To them ten children, four sons and six daughters were born, who are all with us today, except one son who, in the years of his early manhood preceeded the father to his eternal home. After some years on a farm near Lena, Illinois. the family moved to Rockford, Iowa. Later they moved back to Stephenson County, Illinois, and after a stay of six years, the family came to live in the then known as German, now Liberty Township, Hancock County. For nearly ten years the parents have resided in Klemme.

The deceased was blessed with good health and a robust constitution and up to the time of his last sickness knew little of physical suffering.

He contracted a cold and on the second of May serious complications set in which after nine days brought his physical life to an end. Life is full of mysteries and true are the words of the Psalmist: "In the midst of life we are in death."

The deceased leaves to mourn his departure his widow; his sons, Henry, Elmer and Ralph; his daughters, Mrs. Arthur Schoenwetter, Mrs. Fred Schlicting, Mrs. Wm. Ax. EXCAVATION REVEALS EARLY KLEMME HISTORY

King Tut's Tomb Has Nothing On Us

When Art Kuck excavated across the street last Saturday in front of the Greimann garage to connect to he sewer, a bit of early Klemme history was revealed.

About four and a half feet below the surface of the street Art hit some wood and when it was dug away it appeared to be an old wooden culvert which evidently crossed the street many years ago. It was diagonally across the street of today, and it appeared that in the old days the strees in Klemme. or road, ran about parallel with the railroad toward the south west. A little beyond the point where the crossing was found, old sod could be seen. This was down about three and a half or four feet.

Old timers tell us that that part of town has been filled in several feet and in the old days there was a big pond in the vicinity of the Creamery, and where they now make first class butter, the hunters used to make the ducks fly and kill "ponies."

CONTRACT FOR ADDITION LET TO HUFFMAN OF MASON CITY; LOW BIDDER

Heating And Plumbing Contract Let To A. H. Medlicott Britt Successful Bidder

BIDS CONSIDERED QUITE LOW

Mr. E. A. Broaten, the architect who designed the new addition for the Klemme schools, was in our city last Thursday to be present at the opening of the bids in the evening, which he read.

There were quite a number of bids for the work and contractors were here from all over the state to bid on the building and also the plumbing and heating.

Mr. W. F. Huffman. of Mason City was the low and successful bidder for the contract of erecting the new addition, at a figure of $16,711.00.

The heating and plumbing contract went to A. H. Medlicott, of Britt, for a bid of $3,750.

The work on the addition both for building and the heating and plumbing is to be completed by September first.

This new addition to the old building will be equipped with a large gymnasium, auditorium, stage, manual training and domestic science departments, class rooms and laboratory. In short it will put the new completed school on a basis equal to the best schools in the state. It will give the needed and desired equipment and room needed to teach all subjects and accomodate a large number of students.

It is expected that the work on the addition will begin in a short time.

The work includes building the addition, a new roof on the entire building, fire escapes, new windows and doors. and the whole repainted to give it a uniform appearance.

The plumbing and heating includes another heating unit, toilets, etc. which will make the building modern and sanitary in that respect.

With this practically new building and a larger teaching force, the school should make wonderful and progressive strides in beginning the school work next fall; as they will have all the advantages in studies, athletics and school activities enjoyed by the larger schools; and it will not be necessary to send the students out of town to complete the 12 grades, as is now he case.

"Have you balanced your health account lately? asks Miss Ruth Springer of the department of physical training at Iowa State College. If you have found yourself credited with old age before your time. there is something wrong.

"Don't forget," says Miss Springer, "that fresh air, proper food, regular habits and daily exercise, combined with play and rest, are necessary health requirements for longevity."

When temptation to break the laws of nature comes, Miss Springeer says always to remember the old saying, "What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own health?"

N. Y. POISON PEN WRITES TRAGEDY

Scurrilous Letters Rock Gotham Society; Prominent Publisher Indicted.

WIDESPREAD SCANDAL BARED

Death and Divorce in Wake of Notes —Allan A. Ryan Starts Investigation—Names Famous in Smart Set Mentioned.

New York, May 12.—Existence in this city of a vicious band of well-to-do clubmen who have specialized for nearly ten years in sending to wealthy and socially prominent persons scurrilous letters attacking their relatives and friends was disclosed by District Attorney Banton, after news of the indictment of George Maxwell, president of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, had leaked out.

Activities of the band—or of Maxwell alone, assisted by men who may unwittingly have aided him by posting his letters, Mr. Banton is not yet sure—have resulted in one or more suicides, the disruption of at least nine homes, and the incarceration in private insane asylums or the banishment of several persons whose families were misled by the circumstantial nature of the stories concerning them.

The district attorney's office already has obtained possession of 157 of the scurrilous letters, and more than 100 persons have been questioned by the grand jury, which indicted Maxwell, and which is still being held for further developments.

The investigators say one of the greatest scandals of years is impending and that the revelation of the names of those in "the gang" and of its victims will startle the country.

A number of witnesses whose stories Mr. Banton was eager to lay before the grand jury have departed for the Bermudas and other foreign places, unwilling to face the publicity their connection with the case would be sure to bring. Mr. Banton said he feared publicity given the matter, despite his efforts to keep it secret, would result in the departure of other witnesses.

Investigation of the "poison-pen" plot began when Allan A. Ryan, financier and son of Thomas Fortune Ryan, went to Mr. Banton with letters he had received connecting the name of Mrs. Ryan with that of Maxwell. Declaring he had full confidence in his wife, and was willing to face any amount of publicity necessary to bring the writer to justice, he urged Mr. Banton to push an investigation.

AWAIT PEKING NEWS

Washington Officials Consider Taking China's Railroad.

Foreign Nations Talk of Controlling the Line—State Department Has No Confirmation of Any Slayings.

Washington, May 10.—While official Washington waits for news from China which will assure the public of the release of Americans held for ransom in Shantung by Chinese bandits, there is considerable speculation regarding the probability of the powers which participated at the Washington arms conference in the draft of the nine-power treaty affecting China taking concerted action to afford protection to foreigners while central government in China remains impotent.

Officials here are convinced that the Chinese government is unable to maintain order, based on the last report from Peking that the British minister had suggested a conference of the diplomatic corps to consider a plan for bringing the Tientsin-Pukow railway, upon which the recent bandit raid occurred, under foreign control.

State department officials denied any knowledge of formal conferences. It was pointed out, however, that conferences between members of the diplomatic corps in Peking were frequent and that American Minister Schurman would naturally speak for the United States.

No confirmation has yet been received by the department of reports that Americans have been killed by the bandits.

SOVIET ENVOY SLAIN IN CAFE

Russian Delegate to Lausanne Parley Shot Down by Swiss Officer.

VOROWSKY INSTANTLY KILLED

M. Didrikowsky, Secretary to the Envoy, Was Shot Through the Lungs and M. Ahrens, Press Secretary Wounded in Leg.

Lausanne, May 11.—M. Vorowsky, Bolshevik delegate to the Near East peace conference, was assassinated at 9:30 Thursday night as he sat at dinner with two of his secretaries in the Hotel Cecil restaurant.

The assassin is Maurice Alexandre Conradi, aged thirty-eight, a Swiss officer, formerly a captain in the imperial Russian army. Conradi entered the hotel at 8 p. m., sat at a table, and waited.

M. Vorowsky, who was fifty-five years old, accompanied by a press secretary, John Ahrens, who is thirty-five, and Ahrens' secretary, Didrikowsky, thirty, descended to the dinner table after they were assured there were few people about the hotel. They took a table in the middle of the room, Conradi shortly afterward moving to an adjoining table to drink coffee.

The Swiss officer rose after the Russians had ordered their meal, turned on M. Vorowsky, and fired three shots at the diplomat. One bullet went through his heart, one through his throat, and the third in his leg.

Ahrens, on M. Vorowsky's far side, rose in an effort to defend the Bolshevik chief, but before he could draw his revolver Conradi shot him twice. Then the Swiss turned swiftly and fired at Didrikowsky, the young secretary. M. Vorowsky was instantly killed, M. Didrikowsky was shot through the lungs, and M. Ahrens was shot through the leg.

After seeing the Russians fall, Conradi walked calmly to the door, where the head waiter of the luxurious hotel approached him. Putting the revelver on the flat of his palm, Conradi said: "I have killed him. Call the police."

Conradi after handing the gun to the head waiter in the hall of the hotel lighted a cigarette. Waiters and attendants rushed in and out of the dining room, while the assassin stood calmly smoking, awaiting the police.

The police arrived five minutes later and took him to the station, where he gave the only statement:

"I have avenged my father and my uncle, who were tortured to death by the Bolsheviki in Russia. I have saved the world from Bolshevism."

WHO'S WHO in the WORLD

"Fighting Daughters" Elect Mrs. Cook

Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook of Cooksburg, Pa. (portrait herewith), is the new president-general of the Daughters of the American Revolution. She received 940 votes to 779 for Mrs. G. Wallace Hanger of Washington, her only opponent. She succeeds Mrs. George Maynard Miner of Connecticut.

Mrs. William Cumming Story of New York, one of three avowed candidates suddenly announced her withdrawal from the race while nominations were being made at the annual congress of the society. Announcing that she was withdrawing in favor of Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook, Mrs. Story told the delegates she did so "in repudiation of a campaign based upon defamation of the character of a candidate." Her statement threw the convention into an uproar. After Mrs. Story's withdrawal, announcement was made by her campaign managers that her entire ticket had withdrawn.

Mrs. Thomas A. Edison of New Jersey was elected chaplain general by a vote of 871 to 746 over Mrs. Rhett Goode of Alabama, who was Mrs. Cook's candidate. All the remainder of the Cook ticket was elected.

A resolution memorializing congress to enact a uniform divorce law was adopted.

Farmer-Governor After Model Law

Gov. Warren T. McCray (portrait herewith) of Indiana hopes that out of his state may come the model co-operative marketing law for farmers of the Middle West. He vetoed a measure, known as the co-operative marketing act, which was passed by the Indiana legislature, and now proposes a committee to draft a new law.

Governor McCray owns and farms 5,000 acres of Indiana prairie land and in explanation of his veto, declared that the bill would hurt those intended to be helped. Half of the provisions of the bill were singled out by the governor as "objectionable," and furthermore U. S. Lesh, attorney-general of Indiana, declared the bill, as a whole, unconstitutional.

The governor proposes a committee of practical farmers, agricultural experts, legislators and authorities on constitutional law to create the model law. He suggests that enough farmers be on this committee to give them the deciding vote. Apparently Governor McCray's program will not have the support of the Indiana Farm Bureau federation, which backed the bill he vetoed. President W. H. Settle has announced that he would not confer with the governor on the new bill.

Rear Admiral Philip Andrews, now commander of the Norfolk navy yard, to command the naval forces in Europe, with rank of vice admiral. Rear Admiral Newton A. McCully of the general board to become commander-in-chief of the scouting fleet, June 30, with rank of vice admiral.

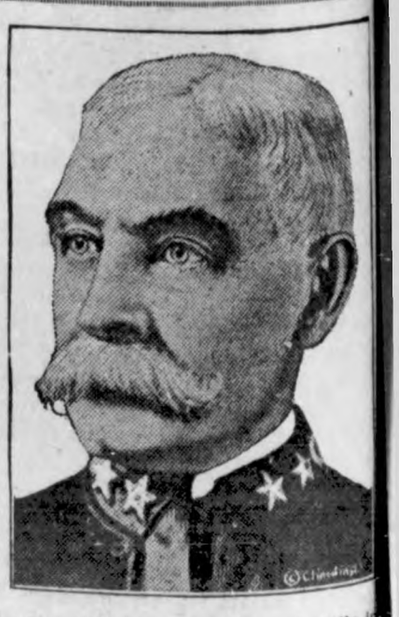
Chester's International Oil Romance



Here is an up-to-date portrait of Rear Admiral Colby Mitchel Chester, U. S. N., retired, whose name is now a household word wherever the world struggle for oil is of interest.

The Chester concession or Chester project is not a political upstart, parvenu or a product of a skillfully planned after-the-war stroke of policy. It came into being one morning early in 1889 when the American warship Kentucky, under command of Rear Admiral Chester, steamed up from the Sea of Marmora and rounding Seraglio point dropped anchor off the Galata piers, Constantinople. That was thirty-four years ago and the incidents clustering around this project from that time until the granting to the then commander of the Kentucky of concessions estimated to be worth $1,000,000,000 in ancient Asia Minor and the Mesopotamian valley make up one of the most remarkable international romances of modern times.

The Chester plan, if it is carried out, will place Americans virtually in economic control of the new Turkey. It includes the construction of a railroad covering 2,500 miles of Asia Minor, with mining and mineral rights for twenty kilometers on each side of the right of way, a total territory of some 96,000 square miles.

Hey! You Auto Owners--

Any good automobile mechanic will tell you that there is no one ailment so common to automobiles as Carbon; and he will also tell you that there is nothing that will make a car "loggy" or heat so much as Carbon.

We have been burning Carbon out of some of the finest cars in this locality.

Come in and have it done right, by mechanics who know how. Cheaper than you can scrape it out and with no danger of spoiling your gaskets, warping your valves or in any way harming your motor.

UTILIZE THE DANDELIONS

Tender Plants Said to Make Splendid Vegetable Salads

A variety in vegetage salads may be had by making use of the tender dandelions, suggests Miss Katherine Howells of the division of home economics at Iowa State College.

No one with a lawn doubts the supply of these grens, and Miss Howells urges that they be utiiized while they are plentiful and tender. One way to handle the dandelions is to cut off their roots and separate and thoroly wash the leaves. Then, after drying them in a cloth, they should be marinated for a few minutes before serving in French dressing seasoned with a few drops of onion juice. Hard cooked eggs minced r cut in eighths lengthwise, make a most attractive garnish.

Another way suggested by Miss Howells is to pick over and thoroly wash the greens and cook until tender in boiling salted water. After draining, they may be served the same as spinich with butter and vingar. Thew also may be canned by the cold pack method and served next winter.

...UT YOU'RE NO THOROUGHBRED, MAJESTY HAMMOND, ADIOS!"

For a moment Madeline sat on her horse with shut eyes. She ...raded the light.

"Now you can't say you've never been kissed," Stewart said. ...is voice seemed a long way off. "But that was coming to you, so ...s game. Here!"

She felt something hard and cold and metallic thrust into ...er hand. He made her fingers close over it, hold it. The feel of ...e thing revived her. She opened her eyes. Stewart had given her ...is gun. He stood with his broad breast against her knee, and she ...oked up to see that old mocking smile on his face.

"Go ahead! Throw my gun on me! Be a thoroughbred!"

Madeline did not yet grasp his meaning.

"You can put me down in that quiet place on the hill—beside Monty Price."

Madeline dropped the gun with a shuddering cry of horror. ...he sense of his words, the memory of Monty, the certainty that ...e would kill Stewart if she held the gun an instant longer, tor...red this self-accusing cry from her.

Stewart stopped to pick up the weapon.

"You might have saved me a h—l of a lot of trouble," he said, ...ith another flash of the mocking smile. "You're beautiful and ...weet and proud, but you're no thoroughbred! Majesty Hammond, ...adios!"

A bit tempestuous? Well, rather, but it's only one dramatic situa...ion in a red-blooded story of the cattle range near the Mexican border. There are others a-plenty. Madeline Hammond owns "Her Majesty's ...anche" and Stewart is her foreman. She is a transplanted Eastern ...irl who has come to love life under "The Light of the Western Stars." The life of the range has recreated a wealthy, spoiled society girl ...nto a fine woman. And her influence has saved Stewart, a wild, ...andsome, brave, dissolute, efficient cowboy—a college man and a ...entleman once. Of course they fall in love. But he glories in it, ...hile she is slow to admit it even to herself. Of course, also, they ...lash—two dominant personalities. And then the girl is jealous—...hereupon there is the dickens to pay. And what a dramatic ending!

The author? Why, Zane Grey. That should be enough to guaran...ee a stirring tale, with color and adventure and swift actions. He's ...he writer of the hour for outdoor Western stories, with success after ...uccess to his credit.

And at last she knew what ...ed—to be alone, to brood for ...rs, to gaze out on lonely, si...kening stretches, to watch ... to race her soul, to find her ...

...t was she had first thought of ... brother who had gone west to cast his fortune with the cattlemen. As it happened, she had friends who were on the eve of starting for California, and she made a quick decision to travel with them. When she calmly announced her intention of going out west her mother had exclaimed in consternation; and her father, surprised into pathetic memory of the black sheep of the family, had stared at her with glistening eyes. "Why, Madeline! You want to see that wild boy!" Then he had reverted to the anger he still felt for his wayward son, and he had forbidden Madeline to go. Her mother forgot her haughty poise and dignity. Madeline stood her ground, even to reminding them that she was twenty-four and her own mistress. In the end she had prevailed.

Madeline had planned to arrive in El Cajon on October 3, her brother's birthday, and she had succeeded, though her arrival occurred at the twenty-fourth hour. Her train had been several hours late. Whether or not the message had reached Alfred's hands she had no means of telling, and the thing which concerned her now was the fact that she had arrived and he was not there to meet her.

As Madeline sat waiting in the yellow gloom she heard the faint, intermittent click of the telegraph instrument, the low hum of wires, the occasional stamp of an iron-shod hoof, and a distant vacant laugh rising above the sounds of the dance. She became conscious of a slight quickening of her pulse. Madeline had only a limited knowledge of the West. Like all of her class, she had traveled Europe and had neglected America. She had been astounded at the interminable distance she had traveled, and if there had been anything attractive to look at in all that journey she had passed it in the night.

A faint sound like the rattling of thin chains diverted Madeline's attention. At first she imagined it was made by the telegraph wires. Then she heard a step. The door swung wide; a tall man entered, and with him came the clinking rattle. She realized then that the sound came from his spurs.

"Will you please direct me to a hotel?" asked Madeline, rising.

The cowboy removed his sombrero, and the sweep he made with it and the accompanying bow, despite their exaggeration, had a kind of rude grace. He took two long strides toward her.

"Lady, are you married?"

In the past Miss Hammond's sense of humor had often helped her to overlook critical exactions natural to her breeding. She kept silence, and she imagined it was just as well that her veil hid her face at the moment. She had been prepared to find cowboys rather striking, and she had been warned not to laugh at them.

This gentleman of the range deliberately reached down and took up her left hand. Before she recovered from her start of amaze he had stripped off her glove.

"Fine spark, but no wedding ring," he drawled. "Lady, I'm glad to see you're not married."

He released her hand and returned the glove.

"You see, the only hotel in this here town is against boarding married women. Bad business for hotels to have married women. Keeps the boys away. You see, this isn't Reno."

Then he laughed rather boyishly, and from that, and the way he slouched on his sombrero, Madeline realized he was half drunk. As she instinctively recoiled she not only gave him a keener glance, but stepped into a position where a better light shone on his face. It was like red bronze, bold, raw, sharp. Like that of all women whose beauty and charm had brought them much before the world, Miss Hammond's intuition had been developed until she had a delicate and exquisitely sensitive perception of the nature of men and of her effect upon them. This crude cowboy, under the influence of drink, had affronted her; nevertheless, whatever was in his mind, he meant no insult.

"I shall be greatly obliged to you if you will show me to the hotel," she said.

"Lady, you wait here," he replied, slowly, as if his thought did not come swiftly. "I'll go fetch the porter."

She thanked him, and as he went out, closing the door, she sat down in considerable relief. It occurred to her that she should have mentioned her brother's name. Then she fell to wondering what living with such uncouth cowboys had done to Alfred. She alone of her family had ever believed in any latent good in Alfred Hammond, and her faith had scarcely survived the two years of silence.

Waiting there, she again found herself listening to the moan of the wind through the wires. Then Madeline heard a rapid pattering, low at first and growing louder, which presently she recognized as the galloping of horses. She went to the window, thinking, hoping her brother had arrived. But as the clatter increased to a roar, shadows sped by—lean horses, flying manes and tails, sombreroed riders, all strange and wild in her sight. Recalling what the conductor had said, she was at some pains to quell her uneasiness. Then out of the gloom two figures appeared, one tall, the other slight. The cowboy entered, pulling a disheveled figure—that of a priest, a padre, whose mantle had manifestly been disarranged by the rude grasp of his captor. Plain it was that the padre was extremely terrified.

Madeline Hammond gazed in bewilderment at the little man, so pale and shaken, and a protest trembled upon her lips; but it was never uttered, for this half-drunken cowboy now appeared to be a cool, grim-smiling devil; and stretching out a long arm, he grasped her and swung her back to the bench.

"You stay there!" he ordered.

His voice, though neither brutal nor harsh nor cruel, had the unaccountable effect of making her feel powerless to move. No man had ever before addressed her in such a tone. It was the woman in her that obeyed—not the personality of proud Madeline Hammond.

The padre lifted his clasped hands as if supplicating for his life, and began to speak hurriedly in Spanish. Madeline did not understand the language. The cowboy pulled out a huge gun and brandished it in the priest's face. Then he lowered it, apparently to point it at the priest's feet. There was a red flash, and then a thundering report that stunned Madeline. The room filled with smoke and the smell of powder. When she could see distinctly through the smoke she experienced a sensation of immeasurable relief that the cowboy had not shot the padre. But he was still waving the gun, and now appeared to be dragging his victim toward her. What possibly could be the drunken fool's intention? This must be, this surely was a cowboy trick. Madeline no sooner thought of it than she made certain her brother was introducing her to a Wild West amusement. She could scarcely believe it, yet it must be true. Probably he stood just outside the door or window laughing at her embarrassment.

Anger checked her panic. She straightened up with what composure this surprise had left her and started for the door. But the cowboy barred her passage—grasped her arms. Then Madeline divined that her brother could not have any knowledge of this indignity. It was no trick. Poise, dignity, culture — all the acquired habits of character—fled before the instinct to fight. She was athletic. She fought. She struggled desperately. But he forced her back with hands of iron. She had never known a man could be so strong.

"What—do you—mean?" she panted.

"Dearie, ease up a little on the bridle," he replied, gaily.

Madeline thought she must be dreaming. She could not think clearly. She not only saw this man, but also felt his powerful presence. And the shaking priest, the haze of blue smoke, the smell of powder—these were not unreal.

Then close before her eyes burst another blinding red flash, and close at her ears bellowed another report. Unable to stand, Madeline slipped down onto the bench. Her drifting faculties refused clearly to record what transpired during the next few moments; presently, however, as her mind steadied somewhat, she heard, though as in a dream, the voice of the padre hurrying over strange words. It ceased, and then the cowboy's voice stirred her.

"Lady, say Si—Si. Say it—quick! Say it—Si!"

From sheer suggestion, a force irresistible at this moment when her will was clamped by panic, she spoke the word.

"And now, lady—so we can finish this properly—what's your name?"

Still obeying mechanically, she told him.

He stared for a while, as if the name had awakened associations in a mind somewhat befogged. He leaned back unsteadily.

"What name?" he demanded.

"Madeline Hammond. I am Alfred Hammond's sister."

He put his hand up and brushed at an imaginary something before his eyes. "You're not—Majesty Hammond?"

How strange—stranger than anything that had ever happened to her before—was it to hear that name on the lips of this cowboy! It was a name by which she was familiarly known, though only those nearest and dearest to her had the privilege of using it. And now it revived her dulled faculties, and by an effort she regained control of herself.

"You are Majesty Hammond," and this time he affirmed wonderingly rather than questioned.

Madeline rose and faced him.

"Yes, I am."

He slammed his gun back into its holster.

"Well, I reckon we won't go on with it, then."

"With what, sir? And why did you force me to say Si to this priest?"

"I reckon that was a way I took to show him you'd be willing to get married."

"Oh! . . . You—you! . . ." Words failed her.

This appeared to galvanize the cowboy into action. He grasped the padre and led him toward the door, cursing and threatening, no doubt enjoining secrecy. Then he pushed him across the threshold and stood there breathing hard and wrestling with himself.

She Fought. She Struggled Desperately.

"Here—wait—wait a minute, Miss Hammond," he said, huskily. "You could fall into worse company than mine—though I reckon you sure think not. I'm pretty drunk, but I'm—all right otherwise. Just wait—a minute."

She stood quivering and blazing with wrath, and watched this savage fight his drunkenness. Madeline saw the dark, damp hair lift from his brows as he held it up to the cool wind.

The cowboy turned and began to talk.

"You see—I was pretty drunk," he labored. "There was a fiesta—and a wedding. I do fool things when I'm drunk. I made a fool bet I'd marry the first girl who came to town. . . . If you hadn't worn that veil—the fellows were joshing me—and Ed Linton was getting married—and everybody always wants to gamble. . . . I must have been pretty drunk."

"Explanations are not necessary," she interrupted. "I am very tired—distressed. The hour is late. Have you the slightest idea what it means to be a gentleman?"

His bronzed face burned a flaming crimson.

"Is my brother here—in town tonight?" Madeline went on.

"No. He's at his ranch."

"But I wired him."

"Like as not the message is over in his box at the P. O. He'll be in town tomorrow. He's shipping cattle for Stillwell."

"Meanwhile I must go to a hotel. Will you please—"

If he heard her last words he showed no evidence of it. A noise outside had attracted his attention. Madeline listened. Low voices of men, the softer liquid tones of a woman, drifted in through the open door. They spoke in Spanish, and the voices grew louder. Then the woman's voice, hurried and broken, rising higher, was eloquent of vain appeal.

The cowboy's demeanor startled Madeline into anticipation of something dreadful. She was not deceived. From outside came the sound of a scuffle—a muffled shot, a groan, the thud of a falling body, a woman's low cry, and footsteps padding away in rapid retreat.

Madeline Hammond leaned weakly back in her seat, cold and sick, and for a moment her ears throbbed to the tramp of the dancers across the way and the rhythm of the cheap music. Then into the open door-place flashed a girl's tragic face, lighted by dark eyes and framed by dusky hair. The girl reached a slim brown hand round the side of the door and held on as if to support herself.

"Senor—Gene!" she exclaimed; and breathless glad recognition made a sudden break in her terror.

"Bonita!" The cowboy leaped to her. "Girl! Are you hurt?"

"No, senor."

He took hold of her. "I heard—somebody got shot. Was it Danny?"

"No, senor."

"Did Danny do the shooting? Tell me, girl."

"No, senor."

"I'm sure glad. I thought Danny was mixed up in that. He had Stillwell's money for the boys—I was afraid. . . . Say, Bonita, but you'll get in trouble. Who was with you? What did you do?"

"Senor Gene—they Don Carlos vaqueros—they quarrel over me. I only dance a leetle, smile a leetle, and they quarrel. I beg they be good—watch out for Sheriff Hawe . . . and now Sheriff Hawe put me in jail. I so frighten; he try make leetle love to Bonita once, and now he hate me like he hate Senor Gene."

"Pat Hawe won't put you in jail. Take my horse and hit the Peloncillo trail. Bonita, promise to stay away from El Cajon."

"Si, Senor."

He led her outside. Madeline heard the horse snort and champ his bit. The cowboy spoke low; only a few words were intelligible—"stirrups . . . wait . . . out of town . . . mountain . . . trail . . . now ride!"

A moment's silence ensued, and was broken by a pounding of hoofs, a pattering of gravel. Then Madeline saw a big, dark horse run into the wide space. She caught a glimpse of wind-swept scarf and hair, a little form low down in the saddle. The horse was outlined in black against the line of dim lights. There was something wild and splendid in his flight.

Directly the cowboy appeared again in the doorway.

"Miss Hammond, I reckon we want to rustle out of here. Been bad goings-on. And there's a train due."

She hurried into the open air, not daring to look back or to either side. Her guide strode swiftly. She had almost to run to keep up with him.

Suddenly aware that she had been led beyond the line of houses, she spoke:

"Where are you taking me?"

"To Florence Kingsley," he replied.

"Who is she?"

"I reckon she's your brother's best friend out here."

Madeline kept pace with the cowboy for a few moments longer, and then she stopped. It was as much from necessity to catch her breath as it was from recurring fear. The cowboy, missing her, came back the few intervening steps. Then he waited, still silent, looming beside her.

"It's so dark, so lonely," she faltered. "How do I know . . . what warrant can you give me that you—that no harm will befall me if I go farther?"

"None, Miss Hammond, except that I've seen your face."

"I shall not tell my brother of your—your rudeness to me."

Shakespeare's Vocabulary Rivaled.

Probably no living poet has a more extensive vocabulary than Gabriele d'Annunzio, who is to visit Paris in the spring of this year. "Most people," he once said, "use only 800 words. I employ 15,000, which I cull from different volumes, some taken from an old book on agriculture, some from an old translation of Ovid, others from Machiavelli's works. Old Italian authors are my daily bread."

Women Compared With Clocks.

Women are like clocks. Some of them are fairly reliable with but little attention, while others need almost constant care, and it is not always the high-priced, jeweled ones that are most dependable. They may have pretty hands, pretty faces and pretty movements, but they are liable to get out of order, and when they do they are all very hard to regulate.—Oregon Lemon Punch.

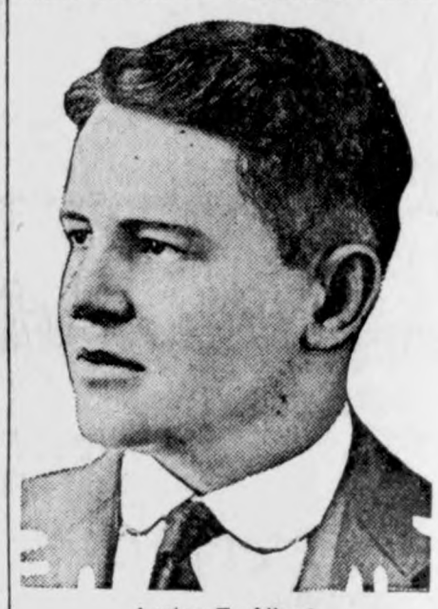
LEGION WORKER HAS NO LEGS

State Adjutant of the Department of Idaho Does Not Allow Handicap to Interfere.

Handicapped? Lester F. Albert, state adjutant of the Department of Idaho of the American Legion, considers no physical disability an insurmountable obstacle. For this intrepid veteran of the World war, who at the battle of Cantigny lost both legs and suffered other serious wounds, has not faltered in performance of his work since his return to civilian life.

Albert, who was a lieutenant with Company C, 56th Engineers, was in action with the First French army at Cantigny in May, 1918. Two platoons of the company were under his command, as he was in charge of the Searchlight section. Their position was under the direct and heavy shell fire of the Germans during the night of May 27.

One of the German shells ended active service for Lieutenant Albert.



Lester F. Albert.

It shattered both his legs, tore off a finger of his right hand, and inflicted many severe body wounds. Only immediate surgical aid, followed by blood transfusion, was responsible for saving Albert's life.

After a long period in a government hospital at Fort Snelling, Minn., he returned to his home in Idaho, and took up his chosen work as an electrical engineer.

His activity in the organization of the American Legion in Idaho brought him recognition from hundreds of ex-service men of the state and at the first annual convention he was named to the post of department adjutant. He has held this position since that time, and at the last convention was elected for a three-year period.

Mr. Albert's determination for rehabilitation in spite of the injury he suffered has won the admiration of Legionnaires all over the country. In noting the enthusiasm with which he carries on his work, the extent of the injury is never thought of. He considers that physical handicap will not thwart progress if determination is a factor in the fight against it.

DISABLED FELLOWS SHOW PEP

Legion Rehabilitation Officials Find Afflicted Men Make Good if Given Fair Chance.

It has always been the contention of American Legion rehabilitation officials that if the disabled man is given an equal start with those about him, the "vet" will come through with flying colors. This is borne out in many instances, but in perhaps none more clearly than at the North Dakota Agricultural college, where 106 Veterans' Bureau trainees are in attendance.

Names of five of these ex-soldiers were on the honor roll of the school when it was announced, a proportion of approximately 20 per cent of the total number of trainees enrolled as against 1 per cent of the other students who succeeded in making the honor grades. The average grade of these five veteran-students was 92.6 per cent for the quarter.

The veterans are also active in campus affairs. Every officer elected at a meeting of the Draftsmen and Builders' club at the college was a trainee. Burton Odekirk, a trainee, won outstanding honors as a judge of live stock when he was a member of the college team at the National Live Stock show at Chicago in competition with teams representing the other schools.

Harry Eckman, an ex-service student at the School of Agriculture of Minnesota, has won a medal for cattle judging in competition with a large class of other live stock students.

A Market Overlooked.

Excitedly the manufacturer of the World's Greatest Insect Exterminating Powder burst into the export manager's office.

"Hey!" he bellowed. "Have we got an agency in Egypt?"

"Why-er-no, sir."

"Well, why ain't we? I see a movie of them pyramids last night and it says they were covered with millions of hieroglyphics." — American Legion Weekly.

Legion Band and Drum Corps.

American Legion bands and drum corps are getting to be the common thing in Minnesota cities. Recently Northfield, Hutchinson and Red Wing Legionnaires formed the corps, and recently the Pine City post took over the home town band. Legion musical organizations already existed at Duluth, Rochester, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Silver Lake and a number of other places.

Prof. Has a Real Car

Professor Neese has truly a wonderful car. The other night Mr. Neese and family and Miss McKahan went out for a ride and just as they got home the caburretter fell off. I wonder if Prof. won't be losing the engine next. It is doubtful if his car would run or not without it.

Klemme Takes Another Game

The Klemme Baseball nine added another victory to their list last Friday by defeating the Goodell High School by a score of 10 to 5. The game was played at West Lake. Klemme made five scores in the first inning and succeeded in getting five more in the remaining five innings. Savogue ad Estle were the battery for Goodell, and Gimer and Elder for Klemme. Gimer did some very credible work and he had a very hard team to pitch to as the Goodell team is very uneven, with some very large men and some that are only about three foot and a half tall.

It is not known at this writing if we will get to play Thornton or not. Most of the Klemme boys are very anxious to play them as they have a good team and are an excellent group of boys.

We Have Company

Lucille Trumbell was a very welcome visitor at the High School Friday morning. Lucille graduates from the eighth grade this year and will enter the Klemme High School next fall as a Freshman. We earnestly hope that she enjoyed her visit.

Write Their Will

The Law class finished their work for the term by writing their will. Misses Stille and Behringer Play

They played excellent and every one present enjoyed them very much. We wish to thank the girls in behalf of the school and also congratulate them for their excellent playing.

Miss Thorman Holds Recital

Miss Bertha Thorman of Belmond and her Klemme students held a recital at the school house last Friday evening. The parents, brothers and sisters of the pupils and many invied guest were present. All present report a wonderful recital.

Miss Thorman says that she expects to hold another recital in the opera house in the near future.

Sociology Class

The Sociology class finished their study by writing a thesis on "Sociology." This was required to be five hundred words long, but many of the students wrote a great deal more.

Last Week in Old Building

This is the last week in the old building as it stands at the present time. Next year when the students come back there will be a large addition added which will furnish a gym nasium, labratory and many other necessities of the modern school. We understand that there will be four teachers in the High school next year.

Mr. Neese has taken the superintendent position again, but it is not known if any of the other teachers will remain another year or not.

Spare the rod and spare the child.

To The Torch Bearers

Memorial Day, Tuesday May 30th

Once more we'll do them honor,
Again we'll sing their praise—
These brave who scorned life's pleasures
And lived laborious days.
At last they know the answer
Men find who die to save—
The soldier's path of glory
Doth not end at the grave!

The path continues onward
Beyond the gates of dawn;
The Great Adventure leads them
Into a newer morn.
They folow it with ardor
Beyond the Day Star's gleam,
And in the cosmic twilight
They find the Field of Dream.

Weep not for these knights errant
Who bravely went to roam,
For they are all together
Safe in the Port of Home.
To us the loss is bitter,
But their's is greater gain;
They have outsoared earths shadows
Of envy, hate and pain.

We bare our heads in homage,
In reverence bend the knee,
For those who fought the fight
That all men might be free.
And while spring zephyrs murmur
Of sacrifice sublime.
We deck their mounds with laurels
Each year in lilac time.

—John H. McGough, in the New York Times.

2 MILLION GALLONS OF GAS A DAY

..We used 1,510,000 gallons of gasoline a day in these United States last year. It looks as if the average would increase to 2 million gallons daily during the summer. If there was no prohibition law just think of the whiskey that would be mixed with this gasoline and what would happen. The first page of the Monday morning newspaper would look like a casualty list of the late war.

EX-SERVICE MEN ORGANIZED A LEGION POST HERE TUESDAY NIGHT

Twenty Members Have Already Signed Up For New Post

COM. BEMIS GIVES ADDRESS

Post Was Badly Needed Here Say Klemme Legionaires

R. M. THOMAS WILL COMMAND

Post Named In Honor Of First Two Klemme Men Who Made The Supreme Sacrifice

BOOST FOR THE NEW POST

For some time local ex-service men have being trying to stir up interest to organize an American Legion Post for Klemme as it was badly in need here. There are many of the boys who belong to Legion Posts in other nearby towns but they wanted to have a post of their own where they could meet with local men at all times. We are glad to report that through the efforts of a few live wires it was possible to put the thing across and a meeting was called on Tuesday night at the State Savings Bank, to which a goodly number turned out.

Dr. G. A. Bemis, of Garner, Commander of the Tenth District, Iowa, American Legion, was here to give an address which was full of pep that made a lively meeting right off from the start. Com. Bemis helped the boys get started and twenty, all who were present, signed the membership roll at once. There were a large number who could not come to the meeting but who have signified their intention of joining; so it is easily possible that the local post in a short time can boast fifty members —a 100% American Legion Post— that is the aim of the men.

The Post was named The Adams-Schaeffer Post, in honor of the first two Klemme men to make the supreme sacrifice. Adams died of severe wounds received in action and was in the trenches 42 days when he was wounded and died the day after the armistice was signed, Nov. 12, 1918 in France. Schaeffer, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Schaeffer died as the results of flu while in training in camp in this country. Thus the Post is named in honor of the first to lay down arms in France and the first to lay down arms in this country.

The Adams-Schaeffer Post elected the following officers at their meeting Tuesday night:

Post Commander—R. M. Thomas.
Vice-Commander, Ed. Jacobs.
Post Adjutant—Paul Grange.
Sgt. At Arms—Bert Logar.
Finance Officer—G. P. McCullough.
Historian—A. H. Kuck.
Chaplain—H. G. Miller.

Post Commander Thomas appointed the following committee on entertainment: Bert Logar, Ben Coobs and Albert Carolus.

The following men were also appointed to look for a suitable location where meetings can be held: Paul Stille, Ed. Jacobs and LuVerne Smith.

A good live Legion Post is a fine thing for any community and we are prowd to state that we have a good, clean bunch of young men here and such a post is a credit to the town. They will make things lively here when they get to going good and if they need any help at any time get back of them and boost. Yes, the war is over but Patriotism should never end—this is a patriotic movement and all good Americans will remember certain promises made a few years ago when these same boys were marching into the trenches; that when they returned again they would certainly be remembered in every way. Here's a chance to show your colors: Be a Legion Booster!

SCOUT MEETING

SEVENTY-THREE DIE IN FLAMES

Bury 59 Victims of School Fire in Single Long Grave.

FAMILIES ARE WIPED OUT

Overturning of Oil Lamp on Stage of Schoolhouse Near Camden, S. C., During Commencement Exercises Starts Panic.

Camden, S. C. May 19.—Bathed in the glory of a setting Palmetto sun, the bodies of fifty-nine men, women and children, who less than twenty-four hours before had been fun-loving parents and relatives, were placed in one big grave in Beulah Methodist churchyard.

Three thousand South Carolinans, led by Gov. Thomas G. McLeod, gathered from all parts of the state to pay a last tribute to those who had perished in the burning of the Cleveland schoolhouse, and stood with bared heads throughout the brief, simple funeral service spoken above the thirty-five-foot trench.

The bodies were those out of the at least seventy-three dead which could not be identified. They were buried within a few hundred yards of the spot where they had gathered for the commencement exercises of the community school, and where an oil lamp, dashed from its hanger on the ceiling over the little stage, had turned the two-story, three-room country school into a funeral pyre.

Collapse of a narrow wooden stairway leading from the second floor caused many of the deaths, a number of persons being crushed in the debris. Others, cut off from escape in this way, were burned to death, while still others jumped from windows.

The exact number injured has not been ascertained, although five persons, suffering from serious hurts, are in a hospital here.

Of the known dead forty-one were children who were in the crowded school auditorium, witnessing "Topsy Turvey," a commencement playlet. Seventeen men and fifteen women also lost their lives.

Messages of condolence and offers of assistance poured in from all parts of the state and nation. Most of them were addressed to Mayor Carrison of Camden, and to all he returned one answer:

"We appreciate your sympathy. No help needed."

HITS WORLD LEAGUE

Hughes Declares Fundamental Principle Is Impractical.

Impossible to Enforce Peace by Force, the Secretary of State Says—"Who Shall Guard the Guardians?"

Washington, May 17.—In an utterance of sensational import, which is likely to influence profoundly policies and opinion at home and abroad, Secretary of State Hughes condemned as impracticable the fundamental principle of the machinery set up by the League of Nations to enforce peace.

In veiled but unmistakable terms the secretary, speaking at the opening session of the National Conference of Social Work, pronounced it impossible to "maintain peace by force" because of the difficulty of supplying, controlling, and directing the force to be used.

Though he did not mention the body specifically, it is apparent that Mr. Hughes had the League of Nations in mind, for the acknowledged purpose of the elaborate machinery provided by the covenant was to "maintain peace by force."

He touched on the failure of the League of Nations to agree on the use of the league machinery to prevent or end the numerous wars which have raged in Europe and Asia since the league was created.

When the guardians of peace disagree, "who will guard the guardians?" Mr. Hughes epigrammatically inquired.

Harding Says Partisans Have Laid Foundation of Hate and Violence.

LIBERTIES ARE THREATENED

Declares Nation Cannot Survive If Factionalism Is Endured, in Speech at Unveiling of Hamilton Statue.

Washington, May 18.—President Harding sounded a solemn warning against the growth of factionalism in political and national affairs in a speech at the unveiling of the Alexander Hamilton statue on the south plaza of the Treasury building.

After quoting Hamilton's appeal for social and political integration under the Constitution, the President said:

"Can any student of our times in America, or in the world, doubt for a moment that factionalism is developing as never before? We have our factions which seek to promote this or that interest, without regard to the relationship to others and without regard for the common weal. We have the factions of hatred and prejudice and violence.

"We have our coalitions which would invade the constitutional rights of others or subvert the Constitution itself. We have our factions challenging both civil and religious liberty, and without them both made everlastingly secure there can be no real human liberty. We have the fatal factionalism which contemplates obstruction to the execution of the laws.

"No nation will survive where this factionalism is endured.

"If we will carry on, visualizing the nation of which he dreamed; if we will maintain the national viewpoint and emphasize the interwoven intimacy of all activities, interdependent, where none may permanently prosper without a prosperous whole; if we will throttle the false cry of class where none need exist in the beckoning of American opportunity; if we will be as hopefully American and as wholeheartedly American as they were in the immortal beginning, the future will be secure. This we must do, no matter what political sacrifices are made in the recommitment."

Face to the East!

Face to the East! it seems a grim jest,
For this is to honor the lads who "went west."
Face to the East! stop the traffic and noise.
The moment is sacred, it belongs to the boys.
Face to the East! banker, farmer and clerk,
Every rank, all conditions, stop both play and work.

Face to the East! This moment's for them,
Our gay laughing boys who died, aye, like men.
Face to the East! and murmur a prayer,
For the lads who forever have gone "Over There."
Face to the East! While Mem'ry enwraps
Her dear arms around us. Now, Bugler! sound "taps."

HONOR TO AMERICAN AIRMEN

Memorial Garden Dedicated to the Glorious History of the Lafayette Escadrille, in France.

Upon the fringe of the heroic city of Verdun there has been created a memorial garden dedicated to the glorious history of the Lafayette escadrille, which it is hoped will become a pilgrims' shrine for all Americans, and especially for those who are in any way associated with the personnel of the famous flying corps which brought honor to America before the United States entered the war.

Within the boundaries of the memorial garden have been laid most of the bodies of members of the Lafayette escadrille who fell in battle. Rather, there were 57 bodies laid there. Six of the men who flew for France under the Lafayette escadrille organization died inside the German lines, or were burned with their machines. These six bodies have never been found. The graves of the others are now scattered along the French front, and one is in Genoa and one in Salonica.

There were more than 200 young Americans in the Lafayette escadrille. Long before the United States entered the World war these pioneers crossed the ocean and gave their youth to the cause of France. Their record of heroism and self-sacrifice, of instant readiness to face superior odds, their delight in service and their joyous verve in the face of death have made the name of the squadron as immortal in all allied countries as it was feared by the German troops.

The project cost $50,000, which was quickly subscribed.

Honor to Be Shared.

Memorial day belongs, first of all, to the "boys in blue." The holiday was established in commemoration of the soldiers who fought in the Civil war and who by their sacrifices made possible the perpetuation of the American Union. Today the memories of '61 are dim. A greater war has been fought, a war which was brought directly home to every American of the present generation. There are recent graves to decorate; there are honors to be paid to the memory of heroic Americans who went beyond the Atlantic to carry the message of America's devotion to democracy and justice. Today, therefore, it is natural for us to give first place in our thoughts to the heroes of 1918. Their story is a story of yesterday; the story of '61 is an oft-told tale of the misty past.

Three In One Shot

A sportsman with a wonderful power of imagination was telling how at one shot he had bagged two partridges and a rabbit. His explanation was that, though he had hit only one partridge, the bird in falling had clutched another partridge and brought that to earth entangled in its claws.

"But how about the rabbit?" he was asked.

"Oh. was the calm reply, "My gun kicked and knocked me over and I fell on the rabbit as it ran past." —Pittsburg Chronicle- Telegraph.

DUST WILL CURB BEETLE

Mixture of Calcium Arsenate and Gypsum Will Protect Cucumbers.

One of the best methods of controlling the cucumber beetle. according to Carl J. Drake, state entomologist at Iowa State College, is to dust the young plants with a mixture of one part of calcium arsenate and 20 part of gypsum.

The dust, Dr. Drake states, can be appplied with a shaker made by punching holes in the bottom of a half gallon tin can with an 8 penny nail. The first application should be made immediately after the plants should break through the ground. After that the plants should be dusted either early in the morning or late in the evening from two or three times per week and following rains.

"Usually from 10 to 12 applications per season are all that are required, altho more are neccessary in the case of exceptionally severe attacks by the beetles." Dr. Drake states. If these directions are followed rather closely there will be no trouble in controlling the cucumber beetle.

"ALFRED!"

SYNOPSIS.—Arriving at the lonely railroad station of El Cajon, Mexico, Madeline Hammond, New York society girl, finds no one to meet her. While in the waiting room a drunken cowboy enters, and she is married, and departs, leaving her terrified. He returns with a priest, who goes through some sort of ceremony, and the cowboy forces her to say "Si." Learning her name and learning her identity the cowboy seems dazed. After a shooting scrape outside the station a Mexican is killed. The cowboy gets a girl, Bonita, take his horse and escape, then conducts Madeline to Florence Kingsley, friend of her brother.

A Secret Kept.

Because of that singular reply Madeline found faith to go farther with the cowboy. But at the moment she actually did not think about what he had said. Any answer to her would have served if it had been kind.

Then she walked on into the windy darkness, much relieved that he had not followed as he had, reflecting that he might yet to prove his words true, she began to grasp the deeper significance of them. There was a revival of pride that made her feel that she ought to think at all about such a matter.

Presently Madeline's guide turned from the walk and rapped at a door of a low-roofed house.

"Hullo—who's there?" a deep voice answered.

"Gene Stewart," said the cowboy. "Call Florence—quick!"

Thump of footsteps followed, a tap on a door, and voices. Madeline heard a woman exclaim: "Gene! here when there's a dance in town! Something wrong out on the range." A light flared up and shone bright through a window. In another moment there came a patter of soft steps, and the door opened to disclose a woman holding a lamp.

"Gene! Al's not—"

"Al is all right," interrupted the cowboy.

Madeline had two sensations then—one of wonder at the note of alarm and love in the woman's voice, and the other of unutterable relief to be late with a friend of her brother's.

"It's Al's sister—came on tonight's train," the cowboy was saying. "I happened to be at the station, and I've fetched her up to you."

Madeline came forward out of the shadow.

"Not—not really Majesty Hammond!" exclaimed Florence Kingsley. She nearly dropped the lamp, and she looked, astounded beyond belief.

"Yes, I am really she," replied Madeline. "My train was late and for some reason Alfred did not meet me. Mr.—Mr. Stewart saw fit to bring me to you instead of taking me to a hotel."

"Oh, I'm so glad to meet you," replied Florence, warmly. "Do come in. I'm so surprised, I forget my manners. Why, you are white as a sheet. You must be tired. What a long wait you had at the station! If I had known you were coming! Indeed, you are very pale. Are you ill?"

"No. Only I am very tired. Traveling so far by rail is harder than I imagined. I did have rather a long wait after arriving at the station, but I can't say that it was lonely."

Florence Kingsley searched Madeline's face with keen eyes, and then took a long, significant look at the silent Stewart. With that she deliberately and quietly closed a door leading into another room.

"Miss Hammond, what has happened?" She had lowered her voice.

"I do not wish to recall all that has happened," replied Madeline. "I shall tell Alfred, however, that I would rather have met a hostile Apache than a cowboy."

"Please don't tell Al that!" cried Florence. Then she grasped Stewart and pulled him close to the light. "Gene, you're drunk!"

"Now, see here, Flo, I only—"

"I don't want to know. I'd tell it. Gene, aren't you ever going to learn decency? Aren't you ever going to stop drinking? You'll lose all your friends. Molly and I have pleaded with you, and now you've gone and done—God knows what!"

"What do women want to wear veils for?" he growled. "I'd have known her but for that veil."

"And you wouldn't have insulted her. But you would the next girl who came along. Gene, you are hopeless. Now, you get out of here and don't ever come back."

"Flo!" he entreated.

"I mean it."

"I reckon then I'll come back tomorrow and take my medicine," he replied.

"Don't you dare!" she cried.

Stewart went out and closed the door.

"Miss Hammond, you—you don't know how this hurts me," said Florence. "What you must think of us! It's so unlucky that you should have had this happen right at first. Now, maybe you won't have the heart to stay. Oh, I've known more than one eastern girl to go home without ever learning what we really are out here. Miss Hammond, Gene Stewart is a fiend when he's drunk. All the same I know, whatever he did, he meant no shame to you. Come now, don't think about it again tonight." She took up the lamp and led Madeline into a little room. "Won't you let me help you undress—can't I do anything for you?"

"You are very kind, thank you, but I can manage," replied Madeline.

"Well, then, good night. The sooner I go the sooner you'll rest. Just forget what happened and think how fine a surprise you're to give your brother tomorrow."

With that she slipped out and softly shut the door.

As Madeline laid her watch on the bureau she noticed that the time was past two o'clock. It seemed long since she had gotten off the train. When she had turned out the lamp and crept wearily into bed she knew what it was to be utterly spent. She was too tired to move a finger.

When she awakened the room was bright with sunlight. She was lazily and dreamily contemplating the mud walls of this little room when she remembered where she was and how she had come there.

How great a shock she had been subjected to was manifest in a sensation of disgust that overwhelmed her. She even shut her eyes to try and blot out the recollection. She felt that she had been contaminated.

"Gene, Aren't You Ever Going to Learn Decency?"

Presently Madeline Hammond again awoke to the fact she had learned the preceding night—that there were emotions to which she had heretofore been a stranger. She scarcely remembered when she had found it necessary to control her emotions. There had been no trouble, no excitement, no unpleasantness in her life. It had been ordered for her—tranquil, luxurious, brilliant, varied, yet always the same.

Then Madeline heard Florence rap on the door and call softly:

"Miss Hammond. Are you awake?"

"Awake and dressed, Miss Kingsley."

Presently there were slow, reluctant steps outside the front door, then a pause, and the door opened. Stewart stood bareheaded in the sunlight. Madeline's glance ran over him swift as lightning. But as she saw his face now she did not recognize it. The man's presence roused in her a revolt. Yet something in her, the incomprehensible side of her nature, thrilled in the look of this splendid dark-faced barbarian.

"Mr. Stewart, will you please come in?" she asked, after that long pause.

"I reckon not," he said. The hopelessness of his tone meant that he knew he was not fit to enter a room with her, and did not care or cared too much.

Madeline went to the door. The man's face was hard, yet it was sad, too. And it touched her.

"I shall not tell my brother of your—your rudeness to me," she began. It was impossible for her to keep the chill out of her voice, to speak with other than the pride and aloofness of her class. Nevertheless, despite her loathing, when she had spoken so far it seemed that kindness and pity followed involuntarily. "I choose to overlook what you did because you were not wholly accountable, and because there must be no trouble between Alfred and you. May I rely on you to keep silence and to seal the lips of that priest? You will spare me further distress, will you not, please?"

His hoarse reply was incoherent, but she needed only to see his working face to know his remorse and gratitude.

Madeline went back to her room; and presently Florence came for her, and directly they were sitting at breakfast. Madeline Hammond's impression of her brother's friend had to be reconstructed in the morning light. She felt a wholesome, frank, sweet nature. She liked the slow southern drawl. And she was puzzled to know whether Florence Kingsley was pretty or striking or unusual. She had a youthful glow and flush, the clear tan of outdoors, a face that lacked the soft curves and lines of eastern women, and her eyes were light gray, like crystal, steady, almost piercing, and her hair was a beautiful bright waving mass.

A sharp knock on the parlor door interrupted conversation. Florence's sister went to open it. She returned presently and said:

"It's Gene. He's been dawdlin' out there on the front porch, and he knocked to let us know Miss Hammond's brother is comin'."

Florence hurried into the parlor, followed by Madeline. The door stood open, and disclosed Stewart sitting on the porch steps. From down the road came a clatter of hoofs. Madeline looked out over Florence's shoulder and saw a cloud of dust approaching and in it she distinguished outlines of horses and riders. A warmth spread over her, a little tingle of gladness, and the feeling recalled her girlish love for her brother. What would he be like after long years?

Looking out, Madeline saw a bunch of dusty, wiry horses pawing the gravel and tossing lean heads. Her swift glance ran over the lithe horsemen, trying to pick out the one who was her brother. But she could not. Her glance, however, caught the same rough dress and hard aspect that characterized the cowboy Stewart. Then one rider threw his reins, leaped from the saddle, and came bounding up the porch steps. Florence met him at the door.

"Hello, Flo. Where is she?" he called, eagerly. With that he looked over her shoulder to espy Madeline. He actually jumped at her. She hardly knew the tall form and the bronzed face, but the warm flash of blue eyes was familiar. As for him, he had no doubt of his sister, it appeared, for with broken welcome he threw his arms around her, then held her off and looked searchingly at her.

"Well, sister," he began, when Florence turned hurriedly from the door and interrupted him.

"Al, I think you'd better stop the wrangling out there."

He stared at her, appeared suddenly to hear the loud voices from the street, and then, releasing Madeline, he said:

"By George! I forgot, Flo. There is a little business to see to. Keep my sister in here, please, and don't be fussed up, now."

He went out on the porch and called to his men:

"Shut off your wind, Jack! And you, too, Blaze! I didn't want you fellows to come here. But as you would come, you've got to shut up. This is my business."

Whereupon he turned to Stewart, who was sitting on the fence.

"Hello, Stewart!" he said.

It was a greeting; but there was that in the voice which alarmed Madeline.

Stewart leisurely got up and leisurely advanced to the porch.

"Hello, Hammond!" he drawled.

"Drunk again last night?"

"Well, if you want to know, and if it's any of your mix, yes, I was—pretty drunk," replied Stewart.

It was a kind of cool speech that showed the cowboy in control of himself and master of the situation—not an easy speech to follow up with undue inquisitiveness. There was a short silence.

"D— it, Stewart," said the speaker, presently, "here's the situation: It's all over town that you met my sister last night at the station and—and insulted her. Gene, you've been on the wrong trail for some time, drinking and all that. You're going to the bad. But Bill thinks, and I think, you're still a man. We never knew you to lie. Now what have you to say for yourself?"

"Nobody is insinuating that I am a liar?" drawled Stewart.

"No."

"Well, I'm glad to hear that. You see, Al, I was pretty drunk last night, but not drunk enough to forget the least thing I did. I found Miss Hammond waiting alone at the station. She wore a veil, but I knew she was a lady, of course. I imagine, now that I think of it, that Miss Hammond found my gallantry rather startling, and—"

At this point Madeline, answering to unconsidered impulse, eluded Florence and walked out upon the porch.

"Gentlemen," said Madeline, rather breathlessly; and it did not add to her calmness to feel a hot flush in her cheeks, "I am very new to western ways, but I think you are laboring under a mistake, which, in justice to Mr. Stewart, I want to correct. Indeed, he was rather—rather abrupt and strange when he came up to me last night; but as I understand him now, I can attribute that to his gallantry. He was somewhat wild and sudden and—sentimental in his demand to protect me—and it was not clear whether he meant his protection for last night or forever; but I am happy to say he offered me no word that was not honorable. And he saw me safely here to Miss Kingsley's home."

CHAPTER III

Sister and Brother.

Then Madeline returned to the little parlor with the brother whom she had hardly recognized.

"Majesty!" he exclaimed. "To think of your being here!"

The warmth stole back along her veins. She remembered how that pet name had sounded from the lips of this brother who had given it to her.

"Alfred!"

"Dear old girl," he said, "you haven't changed at all, except to grow lovelier. Only you're a woman now, and you've fulfilled the name I gave you. G—d! how sight of you brings back home! It seems a hundred years since I left. I missed you more than all the rest."

Madeline seemed to feel with his every word that she was remembering him. She was so amazed at the change in him that she could not believe her eyes. She saw a bronzed, strong-jawed, eagle-eyed man, stalwart, superb of height, and, like the cowboys, belted, booted, spurred. She had bidden good-by to a disgraced, disinherited, dissolute boy. Well she remembered the handsome pale face with its weakness and shadows and careless smile, with the ever-present cigarette hanging between the lips. The years had passed, and now she saw him a man—the West had made him a man. And Madeline Hammond felt a strong, passionate gladness and gratefulness, and a direct check to her sudden inspired hatred of the West.

"Majesty, it was good of you to come. I'm all broken up. How did you ever do it? But never mind that now. Tell me about that brother of mine."

And Madeline told him, and then about their sister Helen. Question after question he fired at her; and she told him of her mother; of Aunt Grace, who had died a year ago; of his old friends, married, scattered, vanished. But she did not tell him of his father, for he did not ask.

Quite suddenly the rapid-fire questioning ceased; he choked, was silent a moment, and then burst into tears. It seemed to her that a long, stored-up bitterness was flooding away. It hurt her to see him—hurt her more to hear him. And in the succeeding few moments she grew closer to him than she had ever been in the past. Had her father and mother done right by him? Her pulse stirred with unwonted quickness. She did not speak, but she kissed him, which, for her, was an indication of unusual feeling. And when he recovered command over his emotions he made no reference to his breakdown, nor did she. But that scene struck deep into Madeline Hammond's heart. Through it she saw what he had lost and gained.

"Alfred, why did you not answer my last letters?" asked Madeline. "I had not heard from you for two years."

"So long? How time flies! Well, things went bad with me about the last time I heard from you. I always intended to write some day, but I never did. You remember all about my little ranch, and that for a while I did well raising stock? I wrote you all that. Majesty, a man makes enemies anywhere. Perhaps an eastern man in the West can make, if not so many, certainly more bitter ones. At any rate, I made several. There was a cattleman, Ward by name—he's gone now—and he and I had trouble over cattle. That gave me a back-set. Pat Hawe, the sheriff here, has been instrumental in hurting my business. He's not so much of a rancher, but he has influence at Santa Fe and El Paso and Douglas. I made an enemy of him. I never did anything to him. The real reason for his animosity toward me is that he loves Florence, and Florence is going to marry me."

"Alfred!"

"What's the matter, Majesty? Didn't Florence impress you favorably?" he asked, with a keen glance.

"Why—yes, indeed. I like her. But I did not think of her in relation to you—that way. I am greatly surprised. Alfred, is she well born? What connections?"

"Dear Old Girl," He Said.

"Florence is just a girl of ordinary people. She was born in Kentucky, was brought up in Texas. My aristocratic and wealthy family would scorn—"

"Alfred, you are still a Hammond," said Madeline, with uplifted head.

Alfred laughed. "We won't quarrel, Majesty. I remember you, and in spite of your pride you've got a heart. If you stay here a month you'll love Florence Kingsley. I want you to know she's had a great deal to do with straightening me up. . . . Well, to go on with my story. There's Don Carlos, a Mexican rancher, and he's my worst enemy. Don Carlos is a wily Greaser, he knows the ranges, he has the water, and he is dishonest. So he outfigured me. And now I am practically ruined. He has not gotten possession of my ranch, but that's only a matter of time, pending lawsuits at Santa Fe. At present I have a few hundred cattle running on Stillwell's range, and I am his foreman."

"Foreman?" queried Madeline.

"I am simply boss of Stillwell's cowboys, and right glad of my job."

Madeline was conscious of an inward burning. It required an effort for her to retain her outward tranquility.

"Cannot your property be reclaimed?" she asked. "How much do you owe?"

"Ten thousand dollars would clear me and give me another start. But, Majesty, in this country that's a good deal of money, and I haven't been able to raise it. Stillwell's in worse shape than I am."

Madeline went over to Alfred and put her hands on his shoulders.

"We must not be in debt."

He stared at her as if her words had recalled something long forgotten. Then he smiled.

"How imperious you are! I'd forgotten just who my beautiful sister really is. Majesty, you're not going to ask me to take money from you?"

"I am."

"Well, I'll not do it. I never did, even when I was in college, and then there wasn't much beyond me."

"Listen, Alfred," she went on, earnestly, "this is entirely different. I had only an allowance then. You had no way to know that since I last wrote you I had come into my inheritance from Aunt Grace. It was—well, that doesn't matter. Only, I haven't been able to spend half the income. It's mine. It's not father's money. You will make me very happy if you'll consent. What is ten thousand dollars to me? Sometimes I spend that in a month. I throw money away. If you let me help you it will be doing me good as well as you. Please, Alfred."

"You always were the best of fellows, Majesty. And if you really care—if you really want to help me I'll be only too glad to accept. It will be fine. Florence will go wild. And that Greaser won't harass me any more. Majesty, pretty soon some titled fellow will be spending your money; I may as well take a little before he gets it all," he finished, jokingly.

"What do you know about me?" she asked, lightly.

"More than you think. Even if we are lost out here in the woolly West we get news. Everybody knows about Anglesbury. And that Dago duke who chased you all over Europe, that Lord Castleton has the running now and seems about to win. How about it, Majesty?"

Madeline detected a hint that suggested scorn in his gay speech. And deep in his searching glance she saw a flame. She became thoughtful. She had forgotten Castleton, New York, society.

"Alfred," she began, seriously, "I don't believe any titled gentleman will ever spend my money, as you elegantly express it."

"I don't care for that. It's you!" he cried, passionately, and he grasped her with a violence that startled her. He was white; his eyes were now like fire. "You are so splendid—so wonderful. People called you the American Beauty, but you're more than that. You're the American Girl! Majesty, marry no man unless you love him, and love an American. Stay away from Europe long enough to learn to know the men—the real men of your own country."

"Alfred, I'm afraid there are not always real men and real love for American girls in international marriages. Alfred, tell me how you came to know about me, 'way out here? You may be assured I was astonished to find that Miss Kingsley knew me as Majesty Hammond."

"I imagine it was a surprise," he replied, with a laugh. "I told Florence about you—gave her a picture of you. And, of course, being a woman, she showed the picture and talked. She's in love with you. Then, my dear sister, we do get New York papers out here occasionally, and we can see and read. You may not be aware that you and your society friends are objects of intense interest in the U. S. in general, and the West in particular. The papers are full of you, and perhaps a lot of things you never did. Majesty, I must run down to the siding," consulting his watch. "We're loading a shipment of cattle. I'll be back by supper time and bring Stillwell with me. You'll like him."

Madeline went to her room, intending to rest awhile, and she fell asleep. She was aroused by Florence's knock and call.

"Miss Hammond, your brother has come back with Stillwell."

Madeline accompanied Florence to the porch. Her brother, who was sitting near the door, jumped up and said:

"Hello, Majesty!" And as he put his arm around her he turned toward a massive man whose broad, craggy face began to ripple and wrinkle. "I want to introduce my friend Stillwell to you. Bill, this is my sister, the sister I've so often told you about—Majesty."

"An' Gene Stewart hed hit the trail for the border."

AMONG LEGION FUNMAKERS

Howard E. MacDonald of Seattle, Holds Office of "Correspondant National" of the Organization.

Although the Forty Hommes et Huit Cheveaux organization is known as the "playground society" of the American Legion, its formation and development required the strenuous efforts of a number of Legionnaires.

Among the leaders in the funmaking body is Howard E. MacDonald, of Seattle, who holds the office of "correspondant national" or national adjutant of the organization.

MacDonald was a charter member of the third Legion post organized in Seattle, Rainier No. 21, and served as assistant adjutant and adjutant. This post later was consolidated with Elmer J. Noble Post No. 1, and became Rainier Noble No. 1.

He went to Kansas City as a delegate to the first Promenade Nationale of the Forty and Eight. It was largely through his efforts that order was brought out of the chaos then existing in the national organization.

Upon the election of Edward J. Elvers, of Portland, Ore., as chef de chemin de fer (national president) of the order, MacDonald was made "correspondant national," and was reappointed to that office following the last convention at New Orleans.

MacDonald served 22 months in the army. He was overseas 14 months as a sergeant major, senior grade, Coast Artillery corps, at First Army Artillery headquarters.

LEGION WILL WAR ON DOPE

Americanism Commission Director Powell Makes First Announcement of Organization's Activity.

Ninety-five per cent of the ever-increasing dope peddlers in America are of alien birth or parentage, declared Garland W. Powell, director of the Americanism commission of the American Legion, in an address at Indianapolis recently. Mr. Powell said that if the drug menace is not checked this country will become a drug-soaked nation within 25 years.

This is the first official announcement that the American Legion would enter the war on illicit narcotic dealers and dispensers of habit-forming drugs. Mr. Powell urged that the restriction of immigration to this country would check the traffic in dope and that the Legion would proceed to that end.

In describing the activities of the dope peddlers, Mr. Powell made these assertions:

"One person in every seventy-three uses drugs as a habit. There are 1,500,000 persons now in America who cannot face existence without drugs, and who are swiftly sinking into a condition of hopelessness and death.

"The death of the drug addict is premeditated murder on the part of the peddler, for he knows the fatal result of the habit. If I were in a position to introduce a bill in congress or in state legislatures, I would make capital punishment the penalty for peddling drugs."

Mr. Powell made the statement that the use of dope is steadily growing among children. He declared that federal investigators had recently found cases of drug addiction among high school students and also among the pupils of lower grades. He cited one instance where a peddler was arrested as he waited outside for his "customers" to come from their classes.

Alaska Women Active.

Women enrolled in the American Legion Auxiliary at Juneau, Alaska, are so earnest in their efforts to aid the disabled ex-service men that they have decided to "adopt" a hospital. They have written to R. E. Arne, director of war service, Pacific division of the Red Cross, suggesting that Walla Walla, Wash., hospital doubtless would be pleased to be "adopted" by the Auxiliary and receive the comforts they are eager to supply.

Drive for Better Streets.

The American Legion post of Rockdale, Tex., led a drive by the citizens there on the bad streets of the town. Every man, woman and child took a day off to repair the thoroughfares. All the trucks and wagons in the city were used to haul gravel and other materials, while the citizens did the manual labor. Although the Legion post is less than a year old, it owns a suite of well-equipped clubrooms.

SCHOOL AFFAIRS CLOSED WITH PICNIC IN KOERNER'S GROVE

SCHOOL PICNIC WAS A GREAT SUCCESS

..A very Large Crown was in attendance

The annual school picnic, held last Friday, was a grand sucess. The day was an ideal one and every one in the vicinity came to enjoy themselves in the annual children's play day which is held every year on the last day of school.

A great picnic dinner was served at noon, to which, of course, everybody did ample justice.

As it was against the creed of the baseball team to eat much before a game, a bountiful dinner was saved for them until after the game, when all the Klemme boys and also the Crystal Lake boys and rooters were fed.

Every thing went off fine except that the ice cream did not come until the afternoon. and then through some misundersanding the freezers were opened by some of the women. while the serving committee was at the ball game. This made it so that the cream was unevenly distributed among the people and some of them did not get any. We are very sorry that this happened, but such things will happen at times.

K. H. S. NINE SUCCESSFULLY ENDS BALL SEASON

Team Makes a Fine Record by winnig eight out of nine Games

The Klemme High School baseball team ended a very successful season last Friday when they defeated the Crystal Lake boys by a score of 11 to 4.

The game was good from start to finish and the Crystal Lake boys certainly had to work for their four scores. Gimer pitched the entire game and we believe that it is safe to say that the Crystal Lake made a very few real safe hits. Most of the scores which were made during the game were through some unnessary errors, which will occur in the best of teams, on the part of the infield and also the out-field.

There was a large crowd out to the game, we are glad to say, and we think that much credit for this is due to Jack Wellemeyer. who went around and did some good painting on the side walk to advertise the game.

Klemme's team has shown a lot of very good work and have did much better than they or any body else expected. It was thought that because some of the ablest players graduated last year that our team would be no good this year, but it sees that the vacancies have been filled very well by he record the boys have made.

The players in the team are all young boys and will all continue going to school for at least one more year. All the players in the team are either Sophomores or Freshman except Elder who is a junior. This fixes it so that Klemme will have nearly the same team for two years to come. You ought to expect great things from this team in the fuure and look forward to next season's games.

Folowing is the total scores made by Klemme and the other towns that they have played:

Klemme—28	Goodell—9
Klemme—19	Meservey—1
Klemme— 9	Thornton—3
Klemme—10	Crystal Lake—0
Klemme—11	Crystal Lake—8
Klemme—1	Corwith—13
Klemme—20	Meservey—1
Klemme—10	Goodell—5
Klemme—11	Crpstal Lake—4
TOTALS 119	67

As the schedule shows we have lost only won game, and this with the County Champions. All the other teams are teams that Klemme has been playing for several years, and, incidently, with not nearly so good results.

The baseball boys wish to thank the people of Klemme and especially the school board, who have shown such a hearty interest and co-operative spirit in the ball team.

School is Over Now

The school affairs of the school have all been. "wound-up" and school days are a thing of the past for another three months.

Thee school teachers that have their home out of town have left for them. and the school children are again going barefoot, that is the child ren of the lower grades, and are having a real time.

We do not think that a great man y of the high school students are so glad that school is out, for we have heard a great mank express their regrets that school is out. We believe that this ought to be saisfac_tory proof that the school year has been made ineresting.

The Editors' Note

This is the last school notes which will appear in the Klemme Times for several isues and so we will here great you farewell. We have tried to make this column interesing and earnesly hope that you have enjoyed it. We have endeavored o show, not only the pleasures of the school, but also the doings in the classes.

If you have read this column weekly you have known what has been going on in the Klemme schools. We wish to thank the teachers for their cooperation in helping the staff get notes as well as the studens who have helped from time to time.

Watch for the school notes when school starts again.

What Their Clothes Cost

In a study of the clothing budget a class of young women at Iowa State College recently found that they were spending amounts ranging from $150 to $550. annually for their clothes, according to Miss Mary Gabrielson of the departmen of cloth ing and textiles.

The majority of the members were found to be spending between $225 and $300 depending upon whether all or a part of the garments were made at home. Altho there was found to be a considerable amount of variation between students concerning the articles for yhich they spent their money, by averaging and classifying the following percentages were obtained.

..For dresses, suits and coats 54 per cent of the total; for hats shoes and gloves 20 per cent; for blouses, sweaters and skirts 10 percent; for underwear and hosiery 12 per cent; for accessories 4 per cent.

One Year of Good Times

A year ago in April postal business typical of the increasing prosperity throughout the country. began to increase in the unusual manner. From month to month the postal receipts of the 50 largest cities of the country showed increases over similar months of the preceding year which run as high as 18 per cent. The reports for April which rounds out the 12 months service since the constant increase began, show deviation from the general upward trend of receipts The receipts for April this year in 50 largest cities were 10 per cent greater than a year ago.

Indians in Indian Bureau

A tabulation made by the Indian Bureau of the Department of the Interior shows that more than one-third of the employees of the bureau are Indians. This disposes of that saying that the American Indians are run exclusively by white men. The Indians in the service occupy positions of trust and responsibility, such as Superintendent of reservation, heads of Indian schools, etc.

Looking casually over the leading articles of one of the periodicals serving the Americans who are ashamed of their country the reader learns that:

Our national policy toward Cuba is one of greed and oppression.

We cannot deserve the name of liberty loving unless we with draw from the Panama canal zone and cease to restrict the territory in in which revolutionists may operate.

Reverence for Law

Let reverence for the laws be preached by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap. Let it be taught in schools and seminaries,and in colleges. Let it be preached from the pulpits, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in the courts of justice. In short, let is become the political religion of the nation. —Abraham Lincoln.

One Strike's Cost

The shopmen's strike of last summer cost the government two million dollars. This amount was spent by the Department of Justice to guard life and property through out the country.

..Ina single agricultural state of the middle West it is estimated that the same strike cost the railroads three millions and the employees six millions. The huge sum total which the strike cost all parties involved throughout the na tion is almost beyond conception. Certainly it cost the public much more than it did the employes, the railroads or the government.

The figures throw a searching light on why the public is opposed to strikes, and why it is seeking some better substitute. The pubic is not friendly to the cause of labor, save in instances where labor is obviously wrong and unfair. But the public is coming to realize as never before the cost and curse of the strike as a method of industrial setlement.

If labor correctly devines the state of the pubic mind, it will not oppose practical form or abitation in industries charged with a public service. Labor will find in the public its surest strength, when it shows a readiness to cooperate with employers in protecting the public interest by seeking less costly and more orderly methods of adjusting industrial differences than strikes have proved to be. —Minneopolos Journal.

The Hessian fly probably will not be a serious factor in this year's wheat crop over most of the important wheat-growing regions, according to reports received by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Forestry clubs, formed by boys and girls are becoming popular. according to records of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture. Beginning with a forestry club organized last year in Crestone, Col., the movement has spread to many other localities in that state. These clubs are being formed under the direction of local men and women intersted in both forestry and agriculture in cooperation with the county agent and the Forest Service.

SOUND HIDES BRING MORE MONEY

Only sound hides free from cuts on the flesh side, well taken care of ,of regular, even pattern. proper salted and cured, can command a high price and make good leather. Greater care must be taken in summer than in winter in salting, curing and marketing hides, especially by the farmer or the country butcher who has only an occasional hide to cure. Partly decayed hides are practically useess.

Definite directions for the skinning curing and marketing of hides are given in Farmer's Bulttin 1055, a copy of which will be sent on request by the Detpartment of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

EAT VEGETABLES AND FRUIT

Children, Especially, Should Aviod Too Much Meat and Potatoes

In a rich farming community of central Iowa a careful examination of the pupils of the first grade showed that 40 per cent of the children wire under nouished. This condition was found to be.lagely due to the fact that the diet consisted of too much meat. potatoes and canned goods.

The public generally needs o guard against this danger and, according to Miss Lydia C. Jacobson of the home economics division at Ames, the thing to do is to eat more vegetables and fruit. Raw cabbage four times a week. That is what one authority on nutrition reccommends. But whether one cares to go in for cabbage quite so strongly as that, vegetables of some kind should receive a place on the menu. Plenty of fruit should be eaten.

Miss Jacobson says each farmer should arange to raise sufficient vegetable and fruit to supply the table the year around.

TRY THIS ONE

A Ford owner installed a new fangled carburetor that was gauranteed to save 20 per cent on fuel. Then he put in special spark plugs that were gauranteed to save another 20 per cent and added an intake superheater that was also gauanteed to save 20 per cent. He then put in a patent rear axle that was likewise gauranteed to save 20 per cent and finaly put on high pressure "cords" that promised a 20 per cent saving. Now with a fuel economy of 120 per cent the owner has to stop every hundred miles and bail out the gas tank to keep it from running over.

NEWS OF WHATS GOING ON WITH THE FARM BUREAU

Ellington Township Women Organize

..The women of Ellington Township held a meeting at the Center School Thursday afternoon, May 24, and organized for. Farm Bureau work. Mrs. Lewis Barth of Forest City was elected Township leader and Mrs. Harvey Rasmus as secretary. After the organization was completed, Mrs. W. J. Elling and Mrs. Chas. Grau of Garner gave a dress form demonstration.

This is the last township in the county to organize for the Farm Bur eau work. Every other towship has been doing project work. The five months clothing course will be com pleted in eleven townships the first week in June, and the other five townships will start the clothing work in August.

Corn Yield Test Plots

Two demonstrational plots have been established in the county to determine the highest yielding kind of corn. One plot is located at the S. A. Barber farm west of Kanawha where eighteen varieties are being tested. The other plot is located on the County Farm where twenty varieties are being compared. Each plot consists of four rows, approximately 50 rods long. and the varieties in these plots have been taken from all sections of the county and one variety from Cerro Gordo Coun ty and one from Floyd. It is hoped that by this method find the high est yieldings train of co rn in the county.

Fair Board Contracts With Big Show

The board of directors of the Han cock County Agricultural Association have contracted with the Cass_Parker Amusement Company of Wat erloo for the night program of the fair August 28_ 31. This is the com pany that put on the night show at Forest City for the last two years, and the Forest City people were so well peaseed that they have contract ed with them again for this year. This is something different than the program usually put on at fairs. inasmuch as they make a complete change every night.

Girl's Clothing Cubs

A number of the townshipsin the county have taken up the girl's clothing project and have organized fourteen clubs as follows: Three in Avery Township; four in Twin Lake four in Concord, two in Garfield; and two in Erin.

These clubs are open to girls between the ages of ten and twenty, every one is managed by a leader who is some one in the community who has been selected for this work. The leaders are trained for their work by a specialist from the Extension department at Ames. The first meeting for the leaders was held at Garner on Monday, May 21st.

A number of clubs have already held their first meeting. Meetings will be held throughout the year and will probaby be caed every 2 weeks during the summer. A demonstrational team will be selected from each club and these teams will compete at the County Fair.

The work is proving to be very popular in the townships where it has ben started, and will no doubt be organized in other townships.

The third annual Hancock County Farm Bureau Picnic will be held at the Camp Grounds at Garner, June 7th. The principal speakers are C. C. Swain of Cedar Falls in the forenoon and Mrs. Ellsworth Richardson of Pella in the afternoon.

The Farm Bureau and the County Superintendent of Schools are cooperating this year and are putting on the picnic and the Eighth Grade Graduation Execises the same day.

There will be sports of all kinds in the way of games and athletic contests immediately after the program. It has been the aim of the program Committee to complete the program in time so that the people will be able to enjoy the sports.

HOW TO TRAIN TOMATOES

This form of Trelis Makes Tying Wholly Unnessary

To prevent tomatoes from having "earth stains" and to keep the fruit off the ground, where it is subject to attack by numerous insects, a good many gardeners find it desirabde to train their tomato vines to stakes and trellises. Such treatment does not affect the yield in any way. but does enhance the quality of the fruit.

The trouble with tht practice of tying the vines to stakes driven beside them is that it takes too much tying. An effecive method, which is much more simple than it sounds is recommendtd by C.V. Holsinger of the Extension department of Iowa State College. Mr. Holsinger's way is like this:

From posts located at either end of the tomato row strech tyo wires. one near he ground and the other a little higher han the mature tomato plants wil reach. Stake the ower wire down to the ground at inervals. Now with binding twine begin at the top wire and opposite each plant make a V with the twine, streching the cord tightly and having tht point of the V come to the base of the plant. Continue this pro cess all along the row. As the tomato plant attains a reasonable height prune off all suckers except one and train it aong one side of he V and the main stem along the other side . This may be done easily, without tying by merely twisting the stems about the twine as they grow. All suckers should be pruned.

Another way to keep tomatoes off the ground is to erect frames in the shape of an inverted V between the rows and cover these supports with common chicken wire. Altho a litte more elaborate than the other, this arrangtment requiers little attention for the tomatoes will grow right up he inclinee.

TOUGH ON THE DEVIL

A young country editor fell in love with a clergyman's daughter who did not seem to reciprocrate his affections. The next time he went to see her he was rather taken aback when the preacher announced his text: "My daughter is grievously tormented with a devil."

"Its raining cats and dogs," he said,
As they cuddled close together;
"Yes," she said in shivering tones,
"It sure is beastly weather."

PAROLED CAPTIVE AT TSAO CHUANG

Chicago Newspaper Correspondent Begs for Lives of Hostages.

PICKED BY BANDIT CHIEFTAIN

Sun-Mei-Toa Selects J. B. Powell to Carry Ultimatum of Brigands to the Chinese Government.

Peking, May 26.—Wearing a heavy beard, and tense under the strain of imprisonment on the dizzy summit of Mount Paotzuku, J. B. Powell of the Chicago Tribune foreign staff and bandit captive, came into Tsao Chuang Friday night, bringing an ultimatum from the brigands that captives will be killed immediately if force is used. Simultaneously government troops were massing, and fighting was in progress.

Mr. Powell had followed mountain trails across the no man's land which separates bandit sentries and the government outposts.

Sun-Mei-Toa, aged bandit chieftain, had selected him as messenger to carry the ultimatum. In the effort to save the lives of his friends and fellow prisoners, Mr. Powell had pledged his word to return Saturday morning. True to his word to the bandit tribesman he made plans to go back to captivity and possible death.

As he sat in the quarters of foreign consuls at Tsao Chuang, pleading that all troops be withdrawn at once lest the prisoners be dashed from the cliff top to destruction, new details of government troops, rushed to the bandit zone in accordance with the Chinese government's policy of force, were already engaged in clashes with bandit outposts outside the city.

There is no hope of saving the foreigners unless troops are withdrawn, Mr. Powell told the consuls, who, however, are still undecided.

Chinese officials state that the captives would have been released long ago if forcible measures had been used at the beginning of the crisis. Mr. Powell is convinced that the bandits will kill some of the foreigners immediately unless the troops leave.

PLAN BIG TAX CUT

Government Experts at Work on Reduction Proposals.

Treasury Department Expects to Reduce Federal Levies $100,000,000 Yearly.

Washington, May 24.—Treasury department experts are at work studying and devising various proposals for the reduction of federal taxes.

Each of these proposals is being worked out to various scales to fit cuts ranging from $100,000,000 to $300,000,000 a year. The experts find their greatest difficulty in spreading such a tax out so that it will be near the maximum number of persons and at the same time work no iniquities between the various classes of tax payers.

The fact that the treasury experts are at work upon proposed reductions does not mean that there will be any immediate relief from present tax burdens.

On the basis of latest available figures the treasury will finish the present fiscal year with a surplus of something like $138,000,000. On the basis of expected receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year beginning July 1, next, the treasury will have a surplus for that year probably much greater and at end of the period a tax reduction may be possible, even though the floating debt is still far from funded.

Secretary Mellon will not recommend any tax reductions in his annual report for the present year which goes to congress when it convenes next December. In the spring of next year, if treasury conditions warrant, a special message may be sent to congress by the President, recommending specific reductions in taxes, to be effective sometime in the fiscal year, 1925.

HARDING URGES SPIRIT OF 1787

Says People Should Rededicate Selves to Aims of Constitution Preamble.

SPEAKS BEFORE N. A. C. MEET

Has Misgivings With Respect to the Common Observation Nowadays That Democracy Is on Trial.

Washington May 25. — Declaring that human society has never faced a more "complex or difficult situation," President Harding appealed for a rededication of the American people to the aims and purposes of their government as set forth in the preamble of the Constitution, in an address at the opening session here of the National American council, an organization recently formed to encourage better citizenship.

The President declared such a rededication would furnish to the nation "commanding and dominating interest" which, he said, had been lacking since the World war.

The President deplored the lack of a definite common purpose, such as was set up by the war and declared he had misgivings with respect to the "common observation nowadays altogether too lightly made that democracy is on trial.

"We will be quite safe in admitting," he added, "that many of the institutions which have been set up in the hope that through them the best aims of democracy might be realized, are on trial. We will make no mistake if we confess that the attitudes and conduct of many people who profess devotion to democratic institutions are on trial. But all this may be admitted without implying that any important part of society is seeking an alternative of democracy.

"No one great dominating and appealing cause has been visualized before us, to command our loyalty and devotion. We have not discovered any single all-absorbing enterprise capable of commanding the services of the whole united community.

"We need to find such a commanding and dominating national interest, and I believe it would be found if we could contrive means to set before all the people the full meaning and implication of that simple statement about the aims and purposes of our government which is contained in the preamble of the Constitution.

"In that preamble the fathers of the Republic set forth the objective of this great democracy: 'We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.'"

"Red" Ruthenberg Found Guilty by Jury

Here's an up-to-date portrait of Charles E. Ruthenberg of Cleveland, O., convicted at St. Joseph of violating the Michigan law against syndicalism. The conviction carried with it the possibility of a prison sentence of ten years and a fine of $5,000. Ruthenberg is executive secretary of the Workers' Party of America and formerly Socialist candidate for mayor of Cleveland. He was one of the 16 Communists arrested in the party's convention in Michigan last August and the second to be tried for violation of Michigan's syndicalism act. W. Z. Foster was tried previously, but the jury was deadlocked.

The verdict assured a retrial of Foster. The jury disagreed in Foster's case, after 19 ballots each of which stood 6 to 6. Mrs. Minerva Olson, the only woman member of the first jury, led the acquittal faction. There was no woman on the Ruthenberg jury. It was made up of eight farmers, one former justice of the peace, two oil salesmen, and one American Legion man.

The state contended that the evidence showed the Communist party advocated sabotage in the overthrow of the government. The Communist party documents seized in the raid on the convention contradicted Ruthenberg's defense that the Communist party only predicted that force and violence would be used and did not advocate those measures to bring about reforms.

Michigan Judge "One-Man Grand Jury"

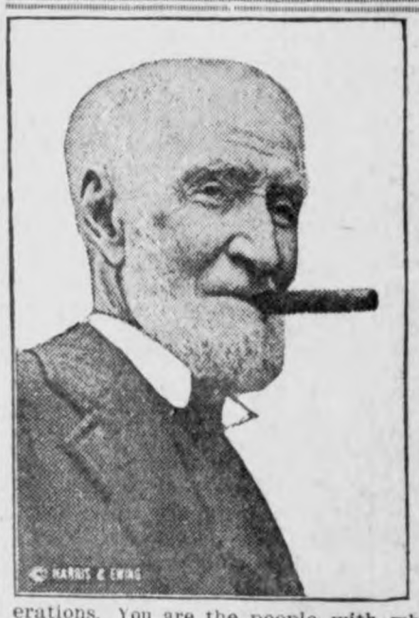
Here is a new portrait of Judge Harry Dingeman of St. Joseph, Mich., the "one-man grand jury" who is acting in the state investigation of the House of David, the notorious so-called religious cult of Benton Harbor. Michigan has a law under which a judge may perform the duties usually falling to a grand jury. This judge certainly has his work cut out for him. The following resume of the testimony of Mary Purnell, wife of "King" Benjamin Purnell of the House of David, shows what he is up against:

"Queen" Mary told of a divine revelation that came to her husband more than thirty years ago that he was the "seventh messenger angel." She denied that her husband was guilty of immoral acts, and when other questions were asked her took refuge in the typewritten copy of the law she carried with her into the grand jury room, refusing to answer them.

While "King" Benjamin never claimed to be "the son of man" or "the younger brother of Jesus Christ," "Queen" Mary said, the cult accepts Jesus Christ as the first messenger angel.

"Queen" Mary said she married 'King" Benjamin in 1880 and has born him two children, a daughter, who was killed in a powder plant explosion in Ohio, and a son, now forty-two, and mentally irresponsible.

"Uncle Joe's" Eighty-Seventh Birthday



"Uncle Joe" Cannon held a double celebration the other day at Danville, Ill., his "home town." It was his eighty-seventh birthday and also the postponed celebration of his "welcome home" from Washington. It was an all-day performance, with a parade, birthday cake with candles, speeches and everything. "Uncle Joe" shook hands with everybody, offering his left bow in lieu of his hand, his right hand having been broken a few years ago. The veteran legislator issued a birthday greeting, which included this:

"Friends, this demonstration of your affection is in itself compensation for my half century of public service. The extent of my gratitude cannot be weighed or measured. To you my heart goes out in thankfulness.

"It is good to have lived and worked with you. You are my neighbors. You are the people I have served in congress through two generations. You are the people with whom I intend to pass the remainder of my days.

"To you, to all the people of America, from my observance of half a century, I bring this message: Have faith. Often you will feel that you detect great uneasiness, an unrest, a threatening undercurrent in this government. This is neither new nor unusual. I have learned that America will rise to meet her problems. I have learned that good will triumph over evil.

"Have faith in the government of your fathers.

"Show your faith by works to support that government.

"Have faith that right will prevail."

Mrs. Cannon Among "Twelve Greatest"

A special committee of the National League of Women Voters has selected the 12 greatest living American women. Most of them you know by name and reputation—women like Jane Addams, Carrie Chapman Catt, Julia Lathrop and Edith Wharton. But did you ever hear of Mrs. Annie Jump Cannon?

Well, Mrs. Cannon has made regular visual observations of variable stars of long period with 6-inch equatorial telescope, and has completed a bibliography of variable stars comprising about 50,000 references. In the course of photographic work she has discovered 200 variable stars, three new stars, one spectroscopic binary and numerous stars having bright lines or variable spectra. She has completed a catalogue of 220,000 stellar spectra. She was made an assistant at the Harvard college observatory in 1897 and curator of astronomical photographs in 1911 and is the author of various Harvard college observatory annals.

She was born at Dover, Del., in 1863. She has degrees from Wellesley, University of Delaware and University of Groningen, Holland. She is an honorary member of the Royal Astronomical society. Her home is at Cambridge, Mass.

FARMERS DO GOOD WORK ON PILOT KNOB ROAD

The farmers are at it with muscle and right good will and the road leading to Pilot Knob Park is under going some wonderful changes. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday found several farmers with teams on the job carrying on good work begun some time ago by Forest City business men. It is true that ourrural residents believe in reciprocation. As our townsmen when called upon, have helped in rural road work, the farmers are now showing that they too can pitch right in, and give a helping lift when there is something special to be done for the community. It is such co-operation from the farmer and townsmen that makes the wheels of progress go around, for surely it is progress to have a fine wide road leading to this popular park. where, before. the motorists found it a most unwelcome strech. Tomorrow the sound of blasting will be heard when the big rocks embedded in the road will be splintered, then some more grading and leveling, and the job is finished ready for graveling. The work being done is and will be very much appreciated by every one who may visit Pilot Knob Park.

THE GREAT STATE OF IOWA

Every foot of Iowa is fertile—no mountains— no barren sections. Its farm lands and farm products are worth millions more than those of any other state. Iowa has never had a crop failure. Of the limittd corn growing land in the world, the best lies in the mid-Mississippi Valley and centers in Iowa.

Iowa's farm property alone is worth over $8,500,000,000.But Iowa in not a "Rural" state 59 per cent of its people live in cities and towns. Since the automobile has revolutionized farm life, no Iowa farm is more more than 20 minutes from a railroad station. Five out of every six Iowa farms have telephones.

Iowa's per capita wealth is the highest and most evenly distributed in the United States. Federal Income Tax returns for 1920 showed that Iowa has more people with incomes in excess of 10,000 than any other state west of the Mississippi Rivtr, with one exception. Iowa has more banks than any other state in the Union. Its factories turn out $800.000,000 worth of products annually.

Iowa is the richest market unit in the world, population considered. Manufactures who go after Iowa business through branch houses, salesmen with headquarters in Iowa, and aggressive well planned advertising in Iowa newspapers find Iowa a market unexcelled.

Iowa ranks first in:
Per capita wealth.
Number of banks.
Value of farm lands and farm buildings.
Production of corn, hogs, eggs, oats.
Value of live stock and poultry.
Percentage of literacy.
Farms equipped with telephones.
Farm owned automobiles.

If you would like to know more about the sales possibilities for your product in Iowa, write to the Merchandising department of the Des Moines Register and Tribune. We believe we can help you solve your Iowa seling problems.

Every man, woman, and child in Iowa could ride in an Iowa owned automobile at one time without load ing over five persons in any car.

In 1922 the Iowa hen coul have taken her products to market and sold them for enough to have bought all the oranges, lemons and grape fruit grown in California, and would have had five million dollars surplus for her savings account.

If all the corn grown in Iowa in a year were loaded on one freight train the train would be so long that the engineer would be blowing the whistle in Boston while the rear brakeman was climbing aboard the caboose in San Francisco.

The above is taken from the Des Moines Register.

CRITIC OR KICKER

There are two classes of people in this country who are constantly in public minds,- constructive critics and destructive kickers.

The constructive critic is a person who looks always to the welfare of his country, or to that of his state or communtiy. He analyzes questions of import to the people with a fair and just mind, separates the good from the bad, and seeks to advance the interests of the one and to retard those of the other. To accomplish this end it often becomes necessary for him to point out to others those salient features which to him appear to be to the best interest of the people, and to expose and oppose that which is inimical to the public weal.

A kicker is one who. does not analyze his subject, who voices his objection hastily and without proper investigation, who often opposes a other person or persons favor it, and who is invariably found on the negative side of questions that come up for public discusion. He is a man who never leads and will not follow.

Tuesday morning during the electrical storm and rain a quee thing happened at the Times Print Shop. We had shut down the machinery, as we always do in electrical storms, and the force was in the linotype department. Just a second before a large bolt of lightning struck our linotype looked like a Fourth of July celebration. Electricity was jumping all over in and sounded like pistol shots. We are got a jolt as the electricity flashed about the room. Then the big crash was heard. The shop is protected with lightning rods, so we can't figure out just why all the fire yorks happened unless the building was struck by the heavy bolt.

Mr. and Mrs. Phil Bock's little baby was taken to a Mason City hospital last Friday for treatment. The reports are that the little one is getting along fine at this time.

The Council met in regular session Monday evening. The Board of Ell Township met with them and the pest house debt was erased from the books. A Chemical truck was also discussed further and one will be purchased in a short time. The Mayor and Council also decided that as there were so many complaints made that the speed laws, etc.. must be enforced. We stand back of the town officials on that and any who violate the auto ordinance should be punished. The public wil also help a lot by observing the parking rules and the marshall and a couple of councilmen will be on the street on Wednesday and Saturday nights to hep car drivers get accustomed to the proper parking rules. Keep to the RIGHT, turn only at intersections, and when you park drive in at a slant—do not back in. as that is all wrong. Drive and park here as you would at Mason City or another place and soon all will learn how it should be done. Speed maniacs will soon learn that the street is no place for races or loud cut-outs.

A Foresighted Indian

An Oklahoma editor tells of an old Indian who came into his office to pay for his paper. The editor [illegible] money; then the Indian wanted a receipt. The editor tried to talk him out of it. Mr. Indian insisted. After making it out. the editor wanted to know why he was so persistant about wanting a receipt. The Indian said: "Me die sometime. I have eo run [illegible] over hell to find you and get receipt." — The Argonaut.

ach thing a little less than the one efore. If we old fellers hedn't been thet way we'd never hev lasted.

"Last night wasn't particular bad, ettin' with some other nights lately. There wasn't much doin'. But I had a hard knock. Yesterday when we started in with a bunch of cattle I sent one of my cowboys, Danny Mains, along ahead, carryin' money I hed to pay off hands an' my bills, an' I want-ed thet money to get in town before dark. Wal, Danny was held up. I don't distrust the lad. There's been strange Greasers in town lately, an' mebbe they knew about the money comin'.

"Wal, when I arrived with the cattle I was some put to it to make ends meet. An' today I wasn't in no angelic humor. When I hed my business all done I went around pokin' my nose heah an' there, tryin' to get scent of thet money. An' I happened in at a hall we hev thet does duty fer jail an' hospital an' election-post an' what not. Wal, just then it was doin' duty as a hospital. Last night was fiesta night—these Greasers hev a fiesta every week or so—an' one Greaser who had been bad hurt was layin' in the hall, where he hed been fetched from the station.

"The hall was full of cowboys, ranchers, Greasers, miners, an' town folks, along with some strangers. I was about to get started up this way when Pat Hawe come in.

"Pat, he's the sheriff. He come into the hall, an' he was roarin' about things. He was goin' to arrest Danny Mains on sight. Wal, I jest polite-like told Pat thet the money was mine an' he needn't get riled about it. An' if I wanted to trail the thief I reckon I could do it as well as anybody.

"Then he cooled down a bit an' was askin' questions about the wounded Greaser when Gene Stewart comes in. Whenever Pat an' Gene come together it reminds me of the early days back in the 'seventies. Jest naturally everybody shut up. Fer Pat hates Gene, an' I reckon Gene ain't very sweet on Pat.

"'Hello Stewart! You're the feller I'm lookin' fer,' said Pat. 'There was some queer goings-on last night thet you know somethin' about. Danny Mains robbed—Stillwell's money gone—your roan horse gone—an' this Greaser gone, too. Now, seein' thet you was up late an' prowlin' round the station where this Greaser was found, it ain't onreasonable to think you might know how he got plugged—is it?'

"Stewart laughed kind of cold, an' he rolled a cigarette, all the time eyein' Pat, an' then he said if he'd plugged the Greaser it'd never hev been sich a bunglin' job.

"'I can arrest you on suspicion, Stewart, but before I go thet far I want some evidence. I want to find out what's become of your hoss. You've never lent him since you hed him, an' there ain't enough raiders across the border to steal him from you. It's got a queer look—thet hoss bein' gone. You was drunk last night?'

"Stewart never batted an eye.

"'You met some woman on Number Eight, didn't you?' shouted Hawe.

"'I met a lady,' replied Stewart, quiet an' menacin' like.

"'You met Al Hammond's sister, an' you took her up to Kingsley's. An' cinch this, my cowboy cavalier, I'm goin' up there an' ask this grand dame some questions, an' if she's as close-mouthed as you are I'll arrest her!'

"Gene Stewart turned white. I fer one expected to see him jump like lightnin,' as he does when he's riled sudden. But he was calm an' he was thinkin' hard. Presently he said:

"'Pat, thet's a fool idee, an' if you do the trick it'll hurt you all the rest of your life. There's absolutely no reason to frighten Miss Hammond. An' tryin' to arrest her would be such a d—d outrage as won't be stood fer in El Cajon. If you're sore on me send me to jail. I'll go. If you want to hurt Al Hammond, go an' do it some man kind of way. Don't take your spite out on us by insultin' a lady who has come hyar to hev a little visit. We're bad enough without bein' low-down as Greasers.'

"It was a long talk for Gene, an' I was as surprised as the rest of the fellers. It was plain to me an' others who spoke of it afterward thet Pat Hawe hed forgotten the law an' the officer in the man an' his hate.

"'I'm a-goin', an' I'm a-goin' right now!' he shouted.

"Stewart seemed kind of chokin', an' he seemed to hev been bewildered by the idee of Hawe's confrontin' you.

"An' finally he burst out: 'But, man, think who it is! It's Miss Hammond! If you seen her, even if you was locoed or drunk, you—you couldn't do it.'

"'Couldn't I? Wal, I'll show you d—n quick. What do I care who she is? Them swell eastern women—I've heerd of them. They're not so much. This Hammond woman—'

"Suddenly Hawe shut up, an' with his red mug turnin' green he went for his gun."

Stillwell paused in his narrative to get breath, and he wiped his moist brow. And now his face began to lose its cragginess. It changed, it softened, it rippled and wrinkled, and all that strange mobility focused and shone in a wonderful smile.

"An' then, Miss Majesty, then there was somethin' happened. Stewart took Pat's gun away from him and throwed it on the floor. An' what followed was beautiful. Sure it was the beautifulest sight I ever seen. Only it was over so soon! A little while after, when the doctor came, he hed another patient besides the wounded Greaser, an' he said thet this new one would require about four months to be up an' around cheerful-like again. An' Gene Stewart hed hit the trail for the border."

CHAPTER IV

A Ride From Sunrise to Sunset.

Next morning, when Madeline was aroused by her brother, it was not yet daybreak; the air chilled her, and in the gray gloom she had to feel around for matches and lamp. Her usual languid manner vanished at a touch of the cold water. Presently, when Alfred knocked on her door and said he was leaving a pitcher of hot water outside, she replied, with chattering teeth, "Th-thank y-you, b-but I d-don't ne-need any now." She found it necessary, however, to warm her numb fingers before she could fasten hooks and buttons. And when she was dressed she marked in the dim mirror that there were tinges of red in her cheeks.

"Well, if I haven't some color!" she exclaimed.

Breakfast waited for her in the dining-room. The sisters ate with her. Madeline quickly caught the feeling of brisk action that seemed to be in the air. Then Alfred came stamping in.

"Majesty, here's where you get the real thing," he announced, merrily. "We're rushing you off, I'm sorry to say; but we must hustle back to the ranch. The fall round-up begins tomorrow. You will ride in the buckboard with Florence and Stillwell. I'll ride on ahead with the boys and fix up a little for you at the ranch. It's a long ride out—nearly fifty miles by wagon-road. Flo, don't forget a couple of robes. Wrap her up well. And hustle getting ready. We're waiting."

A little later, when Madeline went out with Florence, the gray gloom was lightening. Horses were champing bits and pounding gravel.

"Mawnin', Miss Majesty," said Stillwell, gruffly, from the front seat of a high vehicle.

Alfred bundled her up into the back seat, and Florence after her, and wrapped them with robes. Then he mounted his horse and started off.

As Madeline gazed about her and listened to her companions, the sun rose higher and grew warm and soared and grew hot; the horses held tirelessly to their steady trot, and mile after mile of rolling land slipped by.

From the top of a ridge Madeline saw down into a hollow where a few of the cowboys had stopped and were sitting round a fire, evidently busy at the noonday meal. Their horses were feeding on the long, gray grass.

"Wal, smell of thet burnin' greasewood makes my mouth water," said Stillwell. "I'm sure hungry. We'll noon hyar an' let the hosses rest. It's a long pull to the ranch."

During lunch-time Madeline observed that she was an object of manifestly great interest to the three cowboys. She returned the compliment, and was amused to see that a glance their way caused them painful embarrassment. They were grown men—one of whom had white hair—yet they acted like boys caught in the act of stealing a forbidden look at a pretty girl.

"Cowboys are sure all flirts," said Florence, as if stating an uninteresting fact. But Madeline detected a merry twinkle in her clear eyes. The cowboys heard, and the effect upon them was magical. They fell to shamed confusion and to hurried useless tasks.

"Haw, haw!" roared Stillwell. "Florence, you jest hit the nail on the hald. Cowboys are all plumb flirts. I was wonderin' why them boys nooned hyar. This ain't no place to noon. Ain't no grazin' or wood wuth burnin' or nuthin'. Them boys jest held up, throwed the packs an' waited fer us. It ain't so surprisin' fer Booly an' Ned—they're young an' coltish—but Nels there, why, he's old enough to be the paw of both you girls. It sure is amazin' strange."

A silence ensued. The white-haired cowboy, Nels, fussed aimlessly over the campfire, and then straightened up with a very red face.

"Bill, you're a dog-gone liar," he said. "I reckon I won't stand to be classed with Booly an' Ned. There ain't no cowboy on this range thet's more appreciatin' of the ladies than me, but I shore ain't ridin' out of my way. I reckon I hev enough ridin' to do. Now, Bill, if you've sich dog-gone good eyes mebbe you seen somethin' on the way out?"

"Nels, I hevn't seen nothin'," he replied, bluntly.

"Jest take a squint at these hoss tracks," said Nels, and he drew Stillwell a few paces aside and pointed to large hoofprints in the dust. "I reckon you know the hoss thet made them?"

"Gene Stewart's roan, or I'm a son-of-a-gun!" exclaimed Stillwell, and he dropped heavily to his knees and began to scrutinize the tracks. Nels, whoever was straddlin' Stewart's hoss met somebody. An' they hauled up a bit, but didn't git down."

"Tolerable good for you, Bill, thet reasonin'," replied the cowboy. "I reckon you know what hoss made the other tracks?"

"I'm thinkin' hard, but I ain't sure."

"It was Danny Mains' bronc."

"How do you know thet?" demanded Stillwell, sharply.

"Bill, the left front foot of thet little hoss always wears a shoe thet sets crooked. Any of the boys can tell you. I'd know thet track if I was blind."

"Nels, you don't think the boy's sloped with thet little hussy, Bonita?"

"Bill, he shore was sweet on Bonita, same as Gene was, an' Ed Linton before he got engaged, an' all the boys. She's shore chain-lightnin', that little black-eyed devil. Danny might hev sloped with her all right. Danny was held up on the way to town, an' then in the shame of it he got drunk. But he'll show up soon."

"Wal, mebbe you an' the boys are right. I believe you are. Nels, there ain't no doubt on earth about who was ridin' Stewart's hoss?"

"Thet's as plain as the hoss' tracks."

"Wal, it's all amazin' strange. It beats me. I wish the boys would ease up on drinkin'. I was pretty fond of Danny an' Gene. I'm afraid Gene's done fer, sure. If he crosses the border where he can fight it won't take long fer him to get plugged. I guess I'm gettin' old. I don't stand things like I used to."

"Bill, I reckon I'd better hit the Peloncillo trail. Mebbe I can find Danny."

"I reckon you had, Nels," replied Stillwell. "But don't take more'n a couple of days. We can't do much on the round-up without you. I'm short of boys."

That ended the conversation. Stillwell immediately began to hitch up his team, and the cowboys went out to fetch their strayed horses. Madeline had been curiously interested, and she saw that Florence knew it.

"Things happen, Miss Hammond," she said, soberly, almost sadly.

Madeline thought. And then straightway Florence began brightly to hum a tune and to busy herself repacking what was left of the lunch. Madeline suddenly conceived a strong liking and respect for this Western girl.

Soon they were once more bowling along the road down a gradual incline, and then they began to climb a long ridge that had for hours hidden what lay beyond. That climb was rather tiresome, owing to the sun and the dust and the restricted view.

Presently, at the top of the steep ascent, Stillwell got out and walked, leading the team. During this long climb fatigue claimed Madeline, and she drowsily closed her eyes, to find when she opened them again that the glaring white sky had changed to a steel-blue. The sun had sunk behind the foothills and the air was growing chilly. Stillwell had returned to the driving-seat and was chuckling to the horses. Shadows crept up out of the hollows.

"Wal, Flo," said Stillwell, "I reckon we'd better hev the rest of thet there lunch before dark."

"You didn't leave much of it," laughed Florence, as she produced the basket from under the seat.

While they ate, the short twilight shaded and gloom filled the hollows. Madeline was glad to have the robes close around her and to lean against Florence. There were drowsier spells in which she lost a feeling of where she was, and these were disturbed by the jolt of wheels over a rough place. Then came a blank interval, short or long, which ended in a more violent lurch of the buckboard. Madeline awoke to find her head on Florence's shoulder. She sat up laughing and apologizing for her laziness. Florence assured her they would soon reach the ranch.

CHAPTER V

The Round-Up.

It was a crackling and roaring of fire that awakened Madeline next morning, and the first thing she saw was a huge stone fireplace in which lay a bundle of blazing sticks. Some one had kindled a fire while she slept. For a moment the curious sensation of being lost returned to her. She just dimly remembered reaching the ranch and being taken into a huge house and a huge, dimly lighted room. And it seemed to her that she had gone to sleep at once, and had awakened without remembering how she had gotten to bed.

With a knock on the door and a cheerful greeting, Florence entered, carrying steaming hot water.

"Good mawnin', Miss Hammond. Hope you slept well. You sure were tired last night. I imagine you'll find this old ranch-house as cold as a barn. It'll warm up directly. Al's gone with the boys and Bill. We're to ride down on the range after a while when your baggage comes. Breakfast will be ready soon, and after that we'll look about the place."

Madeline was charmed with the old Spanish house, and the more she saw of it the more she thought what a delightful home it could be made. All the doors opened into a courtyard, or patio, as Florence called it. The house was low, in the shape of a rectangle, and so immense in size that Madeline wondered if it had been a Spanish barracks. Florence led the way out on a porch and waved a hand at a vast, colored void. "That's what Bill likes," she said.

At first Madeline could not tell what was sky and what was land. The immensity of the scene stunned her faculties of conception. She sat down in one of the old rocking-chairs and looked and looked, and knew that she was not grasping the reality of what stretched wondrously before her.

"We're up at the edge of the foothills," Florence said. "It'll sure take you a little while to get used to being up high and seeing so much That's the secret—we're up high, the air is clear, and there's the whole bare world beneath us. Here—see that cloud of dust down in the valley? It's the round-up. The boys are there, and the cattle. Wait, I'll get the glasses."

"The round-up! I want to know all about it—to see it," declared Madeline. "Please tell me what it means, what it's for, and then take me down there."

"It'll sure open your eyes, Miss Hammond. I'm glad you care to know. Your brother would have made a big success in this cattle business if it hadn't been for crooked work by rival ranchers. He'll make it yet, in spite of them."

"Indeed he shall," replied Madeline. "But tell me, please, all about the round-up."

"Well, in the first place, every cattleman has to have a brand to identify his stock. Without it no cattleman, nor half a hundred cowboys, if he had so many, could ever recognize all the cattle in a big herd. There are no fences on our ranges. They are all open to everybody. Every year we have two big round-ups, but the boys do some branding all the year. A calf should be branded as soon as it's found. This is a safeguard against cattle-thieves. We don't have the rustling of herds and bunches of cattle like we used to.

"We have our big round-up in the fall, when there's plenty of grass and water, and all the riding-stock as well as the cattle are in fine shape. The cattlemen in the valley meet with their cowboys and drive in all the cattle they can find. Then they brand and cut out each man's herd and drive it toward home. Then they go on up or down the valley, make another camp, and drive in more cattle. It takes weeks."

For Madeline the morning hours flew by, with a goodly part of the time spent on the porch gazing out over that ever-changing vista. At noon a teamster drove up with her trunks. Then while Florence helped the Mexican woman get lunch Madeline unpacked part of her effects and got out things for which she would have immediate need. After lunch she changed her dress for a riding-habit and, going outside, found Florence waiting with the horses.

As Madeline rode along she made good use of her eyes. The soil was sandy and porous, and she understood why the rain and water from the few springs disappeared so quickly. What surprised her was the fact that, though she and Florence had seemed to be riding quite awhile, they had apparently not drawn any closer to the round-up. The slope of the valley was noticeable after some miles had been traversed.

Gradually black dots enlarged and assumed shape of cattle and horses moving round a great dusty patch. In another half-hour Madeline rode behind Florence to the outskirts of the scene of action. A roar of tramping hoofs filled her ears. The lines of marching cattle had merged into a great, moving herd half obscured by dust.

"I hope I have found myself—my work, my happiness, here under the light of that western star."

COMPILING WORLD WAR DATA

Achievements of Men and Women During Great Conflict to Be Recorded in General History.

Compilation of the achievements of the men and women of the World war, and the establishment of a national historical archives for the preservation of documents and important data concerning the campaigns of the war, is the principal work which has fallen to the office of the national historian of the American Legion.

One of the most recent advances of this important cog in the Legion machine at headquarters in Indianapolis, is the completion of the biographical data of the men whose World war careers and prominence in Legion history will be of interest to Legion men in future years.

Eben E. Putnam, of Wellesley Farms, Mass., national historian of the organization, whose entire time is demanded in the obtaining of data and records for the continuance of the archives section of the Legion, has delegated much of this work for biographical reference to Harvey G. Thomas, assistant national historian formerly of Monticello, Ind.

Under Mr. Thomas' direction, accumulation of this data concerning nearly 3,000 Legion members throughout the 11,000 posts of the organization in the world is progressing rapidly. Comprehensive questionnaires have been sent out and there is already a mass of this matter in his office, awaiting classification.

In preparation of this general history of the Legion, the history of each post is necessary. Through the state organization, requests are made to the individual posts for names of organizers, dates, the officers since the chartering of the unit, the progress in members annually, all of which points out definitely the leaders in that post. This information is in turn garnered by the department historian, executive committee meetings and conferences. This combined with the post history will give the entire department history. The history of posts and departments will be added to the biographical data obtained by Mr. Thomas, making complete records for a Legion history, publication of which is now contemplated.

Thomas entered the service early in May, 1917. He received a commission of lieutenancy in infantry shortly afterwards and was assigned to the Fifty-eighth infantry, which later became a unit of the Fourth division. He went overseas with this organization and was with the regiment during the Aisne-Marne campaign. Wounded at Fismes, he was returned to the United States, landing on Armistice day, and was retired from the service in July, 1920, with the rank of captain.

FLOWERS ON NURSES' GRAVES

Maj. Julia C. Stimson Makes Trip to Paris to Decorate Last Resting Places.

Honoring the last resting places of eleven American nurses who sleep in Suresnes cemetery in France, an impressive ceremony conducted by United States representatives, and attended by American residents in France, recently marked the decoration of the graves of these brave women. Their bodies lie in the American cemetery, where sleep nearly 1,500 other American World war dead.

The cemetery, now a shrine of American patriotism, was chosen for the services presided over by Maj. Julia C. Stimson, former chief of the American nursing service and a member of the Jane A. Delano post of the American Legion of Washington, D. C. Major Stimson made the trip to France for the purpose of decorating the graves.

Col. Francis A. Drake of Paris represented the American Legion of Continental Europe at the services. Elliott Wadsworth, assistant secretary of the treasury of the United States, was present, as was Col. T. Bentley Mott of the American embassy, and other prominent members of the American colony in Paris. Prayers were recited by Dr. Frederick Beekman of the American church of the Holy Trinity.

Additional Wards Ordered.

An additional ward building has been authorized by the Oklahoma legislature for the Soldiers' Tubercular home at Sulphur, due to the efforts of the American Legion of that state. The legislature also authorized the construction of an additional ward to care for mentally incompetent and shell-shocked veterans at the Norman (Okla.) hospital, another suggestion of the Legionnaires. The expenditures in the two cases will reach $200,000.

50,000 WILL GET BONUS IN TEN DAYS; CHECKS ARRIVE HERE

KLEMME VETERANS BEGIN TO RECEIVE BONUS CHECKS YESTERAY MORNING

5,000 Checks Will Be Sent Out Each Day Under New Plans

DES MOINES, June 5.—More than 50,000 Iowa world war veterans will receive state bonus checks during the next ten days, it was announced by Auditor Haynes today.

The checks are to be mailed in lots of about 5,000 daily until all of the warrants prepared have been exhausted. After 50,000 warrants have been mailed the checks will be sent out just as fast as the state bonus board is able to prepare them for mailing, which is at the rate of about 1,200 daily, according to Lou Morgan, secretary of the board.

The Estabrook & Co. bonding syndicate yesterday announced that it would turn over to the state reasury $1,100,000 daily insead of $540,000 as originally agreed upon, until $12,345,000 has been paid in to cover the cost of the 4¼ per cent bonds. The bonding company has until July 14 to take up the $9,655,000 in the 4½ per cent bonds. The bonding syndicate expected to pay for the 4½ per cent bonds in one payment.

Klemme Vets Begin To Receive Bonus Checks Yesterday

Klemme veterans of the world war began to receive bonus checks in yesterday's mail. They have all waited a long time for the bonus due them but perhaps can use it to very good advantage. We presume some vet will receive his check each day now until the bonus is all paid off.

The first Klemme vets to get a bonus are: Herman Miller; Arthur Kuck; George Lau; Shorty Kent; Fred Becker and Ben Merkel, who received their checks yesterday.

Herman Miller received the full amount, $350, as he served full time being in the regular army before the war broke out. There are many other Klemme men who will receive nearly the full amount as some were in the war almost from the beginning.

IOWA HENS COULD PAY BONUS BONDS IN A HALF YEAR

DES MOINES, June 4.—The Iowa hen will lay enough eggs in six months to pay the entire soldier bonus of $22,000,000 at prices now prevailing", said R. G. Clark, head of the dairy and food division of the state department of Agriculture, yesterday. "Or the Iowa cow will produce enough butter in five months to do the trick," he added.

"This is providing, of course, that the Iowa hen and the Iowa cow are patriotic individuals, and it all goes to show that Iowa resources are tremendous as compared to meager expenditures of $22,000,000 for soldier compensation and the like."

The Iowa hen produced $51,376,000 worth of eggs during 1921 and $43,539,672 worth of eggs in 1922. The production is on the increase so that an even larger value than the figures for 1922 show can be with safety prophesied for 1923. The production in 1922 was 159,711,000 dozens as compared to 133,100,000 dozens in 1921, but the price of eggs was considerably higher two years ago.

The Iowa cow produced 124,168,089 pounds of butter during 1922 which sold for $58,462,805.12, and this was creamery butter alone. All of the thousands of pounds of butter made by the farmer's wife in an old fashioned churn for home consumption and for sale in the neighboring town are not even mentioned in this compilation.

Mrs. Ludwig returned to her home at Nevada, Iowa, after visiting with her daughter, Mrs. E. S. D. Kahrs since Sunday, when they were at Nevada and she returned to this city with them.

FARMER ON BOARD

IOWAN NAMED TO RESERVE BOARD FOR FARMERS

"Dirt Farmer" Selected To Help Direct Government Affairs

Another Iowa man, a "dirt farmer," has been selected by the nation to assist in directing the government's affairs in their relation to the agricultural advancement and prosperity of the country.

E. H. Cunningham, secretary of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation, was this month named as the farmer's representative on the Federal Reserve Board. The appointment was made by President Harding.

In commenting on the appointment, the American Farm Bureau Weekly says:

"Mr. Cunningham was born on a farm near Burlington, Wisconsin, in 1869. After the death of his mother he left school to shift for himself when only 12 years old. In 1890 he went to Iowa and worked as a farm hand to accumulate money to go into farming for himself. Today he owns a well-improved farm of 320 acres at Cresco in Howard county, and two or three smaller tracts in other parts of the state. Mr. Cunningham served three terms in the Iowa legislature, and was speaker of the house in the Thirty-fifth General Assembly. In March, 1920, he was elected secretary of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation.

"Mr. Cunningham has served as president of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., and is now a member of the board of directors of the National Live Stock Producers' Association. As a member of the Farmers' Live Stock Marketing Committee of Fifteen he helped work out the national plan for live stock marketing. He is also one of the organizers and a director of the Iowa Farm Credits Association.

"Mr. Cunningham is noted for his vigorous championship of the farmer cause. It is a favorite story among the farmers of Iowa that when the Federal Reserve Board came into that state after the war and ordered the farmers to sell their products on a demoralized market and pay their notes at the bank to "deflate" all costs, Mr. Cunningham told them bluntly to go to a place a great deal hotter than Iowa on a good corn-growing day. The organized farmers of America have an idea that it is this type of leadership that will bring to agriculture the representation it needs on the Federal Reserve Board.

"Th appointment is a popular one. The congratulations and the support of the farmers go with Mr. Cunningham into his important new work. The spirit and the letter of the "dirt farmer" amendment are being carried out."

TO KILL THE PESTS

ORGANIZE TO KILL GAME DESTROYING BIRDS AND ANIMALS

A movement is under way to protect the game of this section by enlisting the aid of sportsmen in shooting game destroying animals and birds before they have an opportunity to cause destruction during the nesting and mating season. Plans are being made to have every sportsman interested in game protection, spend some time ridding woods, the field and marsh of predatory hawks, owls and crows, weasels and other who annually kill ten times as much game as all gunners combined. It has been stated that the red squirrel alone will kill 200 birds a season. while the great horned owl destroys annually covey after covey of quail. Special efforts are being made to enlist the aid of game lovers against the crow who is described as destroying individually more birds of all kinds, more birds' eggs and young poultry than any other bird that ever flapped a wing.

All game destroying animals and birds are classed by sportsmen and game lovers as vermin, and it is expected that vermin hunting clubs can be organized here and that members of established gun clubs will join in the movement by going into the woods and shooting as many of the game destroyers as they can find.

The above article was handed to us by W. L. Haberkamp, a good sportsman and a hunter. We are of the opinion that clubs should be organized and go after these game destroying birds and animals. Maybe "Bill" will start the ball to rolling in this community and start a club for this vicinity.

The only expense that the township organization will need to go to will be for their decorations and the work of gathering material. All lumber needed to equip the booth will be furnished by the Fair Association. The size of the booth will be announced later, as complete arrangements for space has not been made.

The following prizes will be offered: First, $40.00; second, $35.00; third, $30.00; fourth. $25.00; fifth, $20.00; sixth, $15.00; seventh, $10 and $10.00 to all others that exhibit. This $10.00 will take care of the expenses necessary to incur. Ribbons will be given for the first seven prizes.

The following rules should be observed:

(1) Open to any Township Farm Bureau in Hancock County.

(2) All articles must be grown within the township.

(3) Exhibits must be composed of at least fifteen dierent articles.

(4) Articles entered as an exhibit cannot be entered as an individual exhibit.

(5) No fee will be charged.

(6) The following score card will be used in judging: Variety, 20; quality, 50; neatness, 20; design, 10

Every booth should have the name of their township in letters in front of the booth or in some conspicuous place in the booth. It is suggested that they read as follows: "..... Township Farm Bureau."

The cash prizes are big enough so that every township can afford to spend some time on this work, and we surely want to see every township in this exhibit.

RULES ON LANGUAGE

BAR ON LANGUAGES IN IOWA'S SCHOOLS VOID; COURT RULES

State Statutes Prohibiting Foreign Tongues Held Invalid in Decision.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 4.—State statutes prohibiting the use of foreign languages in public, private and parochial schools in Iowa. Nebraska and Ohio and 18 other states in instructing pupils below the 8th grade were held invalid today by the supreme court.

The decision was delivered by a divided court, , Justice Holmes delivering a dessenting opinion in behalf of himself and Justice Sutherland. They held that the laws should be tried out as to their effect in making more general use of English as the national language.

Declaring the American people have always regarded the acquisition of knowledge as a matter of supreme importance, Justice McReynolds in delivering the majority opinion said the states in enacting the laws had "attempted materially to interfere with the calling of modern language teachers with the opportunities of pupils to acquire knowledge and with the power of parents to control the education of their own children.

"The protection of the constitution extends to all," the opinion said, "to those who speak other languages as well as to those born with English on the tongue. Perhaps it would be highly advantageous if all had ready understanding of ordinary speech, but this cannot be coerced by methods which conflict with the constitution—a desirable end cannot be promoted by prohibited means.

"The desire of the legislature to foster a homogeneous people with American ideals prepared readily to understand current discussions of civic matters is easy to appreciate."

Justice Reynolds concluded:

"It is well known that proficiency in a foreign language seldom comes to one not instructed at an early age, and experience shows that this is not injurious to health, morals or understanding of the ordinary child."

NEW YORK DRY LAW IS KILLED

Governor Signs Repealer Bill; Says Fanatics Wrote Volstead Act.

FEDERAL LAW IS UNCHANGED

Proposes That Congress Amend the Act by Prescribing a Maximum Alcoholic Content Which Shall Be Sane.

Albany, N. Y., June 2.—Governor Smith Friday approved the Cuvillier bill repealing the Mullan-Gage liquor enforcement law. The state is now without prohibition enforcement machinery, excepting as prescribed by the Volstead act.

The governor goes the "whole route," as the Democratic organization wished. Saying he does not believe in carrying water on both shoulders, the executive reserves the right of the state to make its own enforcement law without congressional interference, repudiates the Mullan-Gage law as hypocritical, and places full and complete responsibility for prohibition on the federal government.

Repeal of the Mullan-Gage law does not promise an era of bootlegging and crime, the governor declares, as he warns all peace officers that their duty to enforce the Volstead law remains unchanged and that obligation must be fulfilled.

Going far beyond the necessities of the situation as presented in his action on the Mullan-Gage repealer, Governor Smith repudiates the Volstead definition of an intoxicating beverage as one-half of 1 per cent alcoholic. This definition, he said, is neither honest nor based on common sense. It is the definition of the fanatical drys.

The governor proposes that congress amend the Volstead act by prescribing a maximum alcoholic content which shall be sane and reasonable. Subject to that limitation, each state would then be left free to draw up its own laws within the limits of congressional option of making itself completely dry or prescribing any alcoholic content up to the maximum fixed by congress.

The practical result of such an amendment would be that a state which so desired might have light wines and beer, while the bone dry state could prescribe a one-half of 1 per cent content.

TIME TO STOP WARS

Harding Asks Nation to Aid in Fight on Monster.

President, in Memorial Day Address, Declares "Less of Armament" Idea Has Been Proved Practical by the United States.

Washington, May 31.—Standing in Arlington memorial amphitheater and facing the wooded slopes where rest thousands of the nation's war dead, President Harding uttered a prayer that the United States "do its full part toward making war unlikely, if not impossible."

"We have already proved that we can have less of armament," the President declared. "Let us strive for the assurance that we shall have none of war."

Scarcely had the applause from those assembled in the great national cemetery for the annual Memorial day exercises died away when the chief executive coupled with his prayer the hope that should war again come to America "we will not alone call to service the youth of the land, but we will draft every resource, every activity, all of wealth, and make common cause of the nation's preservation.

"It will be a more grateful nation which consecrates all to a common cause, and there will be more to share the gratitude bestowed. More, there will be a finer conscience in our war commitments and that sublimity of spirit which makes a people invincible."

The prayer and the hope were the high points in the President's address, delivered at exercises which in their impressiveness and spirit had a similarity to ceremonies in many parts of the land.

Murphy drew $5,000 as third prize and $1,000 in lap money.

MARINES RESCUE THE PAIR

Musical Pageant Is Turned Into a Joyous Juvenile Riot in the Capital City's Baseball Park.

Washington, June 1.—The annual music week serenade to President and Mrs. Harding at the baseball park came to an unexpected climax in a stampede of 8,000 school children which caught the President and the first lady in a veritable maelstrom.

For fifteen minutes they were literally buried under a barrage of flowers, while secret service men, marines, members of the reception committee, teachers and frantic mammas struggled to quiet the little ones.

Bouquets rained on the President and Mrs. Harding so fast that attempts to dodge them were futile. Mrs. Harding removed her glasses and shielding herself, as best she could, let them come. The President's coattail was pulled and his silk hat, standing bottom up, was filled with flowers.

Thinking to stop the barrage, they offered to accept the bouquets of those closest around them. This started a new rush.

Both of the victims took the situation good naturedly and, after quiet had been restored, assured those in charge that they had enjoyed the excitement.

The rush came entirely without warning near the end of the program.

Two hundred kindergarten tots had just staged "The President's Surprise," a song and dance, and their leader, eight-year-old Helen Briggs, had asked the President in song, "Will You Come Today and Play With Us?" Mr. Harding had responded that he would like to come and play with them every day and lifted Helen into the presidential stand. And then the stampede began.

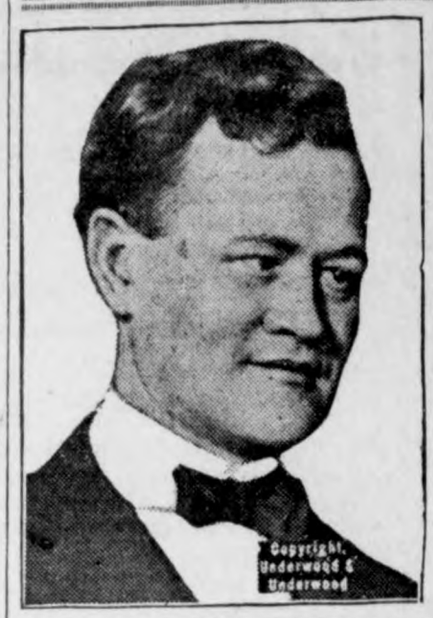
WHO'S WHO—IN THE WAKEFORE

Crowe, Scott and the Mount Myster



Here is a new portrait of State Attorney Robert E. Crowe of Cook county, Illinois, who took personal charge of the investigation of the mystery surrounding the death or disappearance of Leighton Mount of Northwestern university at Evanston, Ill., when he saw that his subordinates were getting nowhere. He confined inquiries on three lines of theory—murder, manslaughter and suicide. None of the inquiries came to anything; the mystery simply grew deeper with the results of each day's investigation. Then President Scott added to the mystery by offering in the name of the university a reward of $10,000 for the person or persons furnishing information, "not already in the hands of the state authorities, that leads to the indictment and conviction of the person or persons for the murder of Leighton Mount; that leads to the indictment and conviction of any person or persons for manslaughter in connection with the death of Leighton Mount resulting from a class rush; that leads to a determination by inquest that Leighton Mount committed suicide; that leads to the discovery of Leighton Mount alive and his return to Evanston, Ill."

Woman "Financial Wizard" in Gotha

Here is a portrait, just taken, of Mrs. Myrtle B. Hayes a "financial wizard," who has set all New York to talking about a "second Cassie Chadwick," a "feminine Ponzi," and all that sort of thing. The largest guessers also talk about a "$3,000,000 fraud." Anyway, Mrs. Hayes has been indicted on a charge of forging the name of Charles M. Schwab, the "steel king," to one of 17 notes totaling $325,000.

It appears that Mrs. Hayes pulled the purse strings of hard-headed business men by the naive statement:

"You know 'Charley' Schwab? He is my dear friend. He'll back me for any amount. Why, look at this."

And then she displayed one of two agreements—the one of December 17, 1922, in which "C. M. Schwab" agreed to stand behind her to the extent of a cool million, and another in which the Bethlehem Steel chairman wrote that Myrtle B. Hayes was "good" for $1,150,000. Mr. Schwab said that after word of the $25,000 note reached him, he cut short his European trip and hastened back to America. He met Mrs. Hayes in his office and she frankly confessed she had forged his name to the note, Mr. Schwab said.

Friends said Mrs. Hayes had at one time worked in Chicago as buyer for a department store. She married C. H. Hayes, a "gentleman farmer" from Pigeon Cove, Me., after divorce from Dr. Albert T. Graf of Los Angeles.

J. M. Beck Called to the English Bar

The Masters of Gray's Inn benchers have called to the English bar James M. Beck, solicitor general of the United States, and the British barristers are quite excited about it. Sharp differences of opinion and equally sharp criticism are being voiced by barristers of the four English Inns of Court in London. A large section of English barristers take exception to the fact that for the first time in the history of the country, a foreign lawyer has been admitted to practice here without having to go through any of the formalities for entrance, which take three years to complete.

It is also being pointed out not only that Mr. Beck has been admitted to the bar over the strictest of all the rules, namely, a barrister must satisfy the benchers that he has not practiced law as a solicitor, a condition which would keep out Mr. Beck were it applied to his case. So strictly that it has kept out Australian barristers in which the professions of barrister and solicitor are amalgamated.

Solicitor General Beck will argue a case for the United States before the Privy Council in London in July. No foreign barrister has been permitted to argue a case before the Privy Council, and when that bory informally considered the matter it found it could not depart from precedents without the consent of the bar.

How Can American Women Aid Peace?

Here is a new portrait of Mrs. Maud Wood Park, president of the National League of Women Voters, who attended the recent congress of the International Woman Suffrage alliance in Rome as a delegate from America. With her as delegates were Mrs. Gifford Pinchot, wife of the governor of Pennsylvania, and Mrs. James Morrisson of Illinois. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, the American woman suffrage leader, president and founder of the alliance, presided over the congress and declined re-election. Incidentally Mrs. Catt is one of the "Twelve greatest living American women" of recent election.

The American women had planned to make a tour of Italy, France, England and Germany under the auspices of the league. Their purpose is to find out what effective peace work American women can accomplish. They will question women of importance in each of the countries visited. In short they will return with a clear idea of what the leading women of Europe think the American women can best do in the interests of world peace.

The National League of Women Voters is the old National American Woman Suffrage association and is distinct from the National Woman's party.

DODGE REPORT IN CHRISTIAN SCIENCE LITIGATION FILED

Judge, Sitting as Master, Approves and Confirms Position of J. V. Dittemore.

Boston, Mass.—After over four years of litigation in the Christian Science Church, ex-Federal Judge Dodge of Boston, sitting as Master under appointment of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, has filed his final report on the evidence. The plaintiff, John V. Dittemore, the senior Director of the Church, whose service antedates the decease of Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, and who his associates sought to remove from office, seems to have been completely justified in his contentions that undesirable and unwholesome conditions have existed in the administration of the church government.

Judge Dodge finds from the evidence, which includes testimony by the majority Directors themselves, that Mr. Dittemore's dismissal was for the purpose of doing away with opposition to the wishes of the majority and also because Mr. Dittemore had sought to establish a standard of propriety and conduct higher than desired by his associates. It is also found that a principal reason for the hostility to Mr. Dittemore was because of his rebuke to his associates on numerous occasions when offensive language was used and offensive jests made at meetings of the governing body of the church. Judge Dodge holds that Mr. Dittemore is still legally a Director and that the effort to remove him and appoint a successor more sympathetic with the policy of the board is legally null and void.

In regard to the illegality of Mr. Dittemore's dismissal, Judge Dodge says that no Director could fairly be supposed to have accepted his position upon the understanding that he was subject to instant, arbitrary dismissal whenever a majority of his associates might find it expedient. The Master finds that the vote attempting to dismiss Mr. Dittemore "was only the formal adoption of a conclusion previously agreed on outside the meeting" and that it was for his associates, then accusing him and at the same time proposing to also act as his judges, to afford him "such opportunity to be heard in his own defense upon the charges made as would satisfy the requirements of natural justice." He also finds that the complaints against Mr. Dittemore were not founded upon first hand knowledge and "were inadequate ground for any but a purely arbitrary dismissal." The Judge also finds that there was never any question as to Mr. Dittemore's sincerity in maintaining his position and that nothing said or done by him in maintaining his opinions could have constituted adequate ground for dismissing him, "unless the majority's power to dismiss could lawfully have been used by it for the sole purpose of stifling any opposition in the Board to their wishes.

The Master declares that Directors Dickey, Neal, Merritt and Rathvon were animated by personal hostility toward Mr. Dittemore and that they had long planned among themselves to get rid of him. One of the occasions when bad feeling was engendered was when Dittemore refused to join Dickey, Neal, and Merritt in attending a play in New York which Dittemore considered objectionable and which had as the leading player a person of notorious reputation. On this occasion Director Merritt testified that he urged Dittemore to accompany them and said: "Come on with us. You are not so much better than the rest of us."

Judge Dodge also finds from the evidence that "There were occasions in 1917, 1918 and 1919 upon which, at meetings of the Directors, the plaintiff (Dittemore) expressed disapproval of utterances by Dickey of a kind tolerable only when men only, and men not disposed to be scrupulous in such matters, are the hearers—thereby arousing resentment on Dickey's part, and sometimes on the part of Merritt and Rathvon." The testimony regarding eight or nine such instances was taken by Judge Dodge in private. In regard to all of these occurences Judge Dodge finds from the testimony of Mr. Dittemore and others, including the cross-examination of the defendant, Directors Dickey, Neal, Merritt and Rathvon themselves, that Mr. Dittemore's account of them was substantially true and that his "repeated insistence upon a standard of propriety in language or conduct stricter than that accepted by his associates materially augmented their hostility and dislike."

Judge Dodge concludes that Dittemore's co-Directors were "incapable, on March 17, 1919, of impartial judicial consideration of accusations against him, especially of accusations framed by themselves, had they ever undertaken any such consideration."

At the present time Christian Scientists throughout the world are deeply interested in the facts brought out by the Dodge report which Mr. Dittemore and others are distributing in large quantities among the membership.

The progressive element in the Church seems to be gaining much strength. It urges a more consistent and practical interpretation of the teachings of Mrs. Eddy by those in authority and a more liberal administration of the church government. Next to a change in the official personnel in Boston, under a definite rule of rotation in office, the greatest need of the Church seems to be for the encouragement of greater local church self-government and democracy according to the spirit as well as the letter of the Church Manual, and a minimizing rather than an encouragement of the greater centralization of authority in the self-perpetuating Board of Directors and their appointees in Boston.

The Power of a Simple Truth

WHEN you again hear the remark that "the railroads are making too much money; their rates are too high," ask the speaker whether he has examined the facts.

Ask him whether he KNOWS anything about the enormous costs of running a railroad, despite close watchfulness over expenses.

If he doesn't KNOW anything about railroad costs his views are both valueless and unjust. If he claims to know, be sure his information is accurate.

More MISinformation is tossed around about railroads than any other subject, for lots of people think they know more about a railroad than those who have devoted their lives to it.

It is as wrong to bear false witness against a railroad as against any other neighbor.

The Rock Island System had to take in $120,800,854 last year to pay its 40,000 employes and meet its other bills before it could count a dollar of profit.

Its taxes alone were $6,163,175. That is where some of the dollars went which you paid in freight and passenger rates. A portion of them doubtless came to your community.

The TAX BILLS for 1922 were almost TWICE THE SUM RECEIVED IN DIVIDENDS by the thousands of persons who have investments in the property, some of them, perhaps, residents of your neighborhood.

For every $2.81 paid in dividends, the Rock Island paid $4.93 in Taxes last year.

It does not appear from this that the Rock Island is making "too much money" or that its "rates are too high."

Stock Can't Get Out While You're Gone--

If your fields are fenced with SQUARE DEAL FENCE, you know when you leave home for the day that your stock will be in the fields where you left them, upon your return.

Does Your Engine CHUG?

DOES IT KNOCK?
DOES IT JERK?
DOES IT WHEEZE?

If so, it needs attention, and needs it without delay. It should run smoothly and have a purring sing to it, otherwise there is something out of kilter.

Don't chug, knock, jerk or wheeze around in a defective car. You may be taking your life in your hands—and your life is worth more than a small repair bill.

Chug along to our sanitarium—and ride away like a king.

And say—just take a look at our new tires. Nothing like them ever kicked up the dust on our roads before. We will put them on while you wait.

An independent band has been organized in Klemme. It is the outcome of the hastily arranged band which played memorial day here. It is composed of musicians who know how to play and, although not a big band, it is a good band.

The fire company held their regular meeting at the hall last Friday evening. They decided to put on a Firemen's Ball sometime in the near future and will make it an annual event. They have also other entertainment lined up which will be made public later.

A couple of year sago Le wLewis lost a good Waltham Watch in a silver case. Monday evening while out in the garden Mrs. Lewis found the watch. Lew wound it up and it seems to run as good as ever. The case was in good shape but had become tarnished and black.

Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Keraus drove over from the Lake Memoial Day to visit until Fiday with Klemme relatives and friends. They drove back to the Lake Friday evening and then drove to Swea City to help Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Mitchell pack their goods. After this was accomplished Mr. and Mrs. Keraus headed their car in a westerly direction and expect to pay a visit to the Black Hills They will sure have a fine trip.

The concrete driveway has been completed at the Creamery. Also a concrete platform has been built at the receiving door. This will make a fine improvement and will be a great help in rainy weather as the driveway will always be in a good condition. They have also put in a new sidewalk in front of their place which is much higher than the old walk. The walk has also been raised all along the street and is now on a level.

W. F. Pavey, R. A. Jorgenson and Councilmen Joe Johnson, Wm. X. Smith and H. L. Suckow drove over to Kanawha last Friday afternoon to take a look t the new chemical truck recently purchsed by the Kanawha Council. It is a Ford truck and is equipped with two Oberchain Boyer chemical tanks of 35 gallons capacity each. The fire company are also equipping the truck with ladders, buckets, axes, hooks, and all accessories. They will hitch tht hose cart on behind. The chief explained that they intended to answer country calls up to a distance of six miles. This is the kind of an outfit the Klemme council and fire company are intending to purchase.

Miner Tells of Miraculous Escape From Death.

As Instrument of Preserving Man From Dreadful End, Animal Was Honored by Community.

This true story of the almost miraculous rescue of a man imprisoned in the shaft of a lead mine was told to the writer, Cora Cole McCullough, by a member of her family. We quote it from Our Dumb Animals (Boston), says the Literary Digest:

Many years ago I was living in Montana. A smelter had been built and it created a demand for silver rock. I owned an interest in a lead mine that had been sunk over thirty feet. Thinking the time had come to make it available, I decided to go there and get some ore and have it tested. I did so, and reached the place just in time to take shelter in the mine from a terrible hail storm. I lighted my candle, went to the bottom, and went to work. I had not been there more than five minutes when I heard a noise that sounded like a cannon. The rock over my head shook, and in a moment the shaft caved in. You can imagine my feelings better than I can describe them, when I found myself buried alive.

I tremble even at this distant day, when I think of that moment. The roof of the shaft was made of rocks, and when they came down they did not pack so tightly, but that the air came through. There was nothing I could do to release myself. I knew that if relief did not come from the outside I must perish. No one knew that I had gone there. A road ran past the mouth of the shaft, but it was not traveled much, and I was not likely to attract attention by calling. Nevertheless, I shouted at intervals all day.

The following morning I commenced calling again, and all day, whenever I thought I heard a sound, I shouted. When night came again, all hopes of being released were abandoned. I will not dwell on the agonies I endured. The morning of the fourth day of my imprisonment I heard something crawl into my grave.

I lighted my candle and saw a rabbit. There was only one aperture large enough to admit him; I closed it to prevent his escape. I saw in him food to appease my hunger, and my hand was raised to kill him, when a thought occurred to me that prevented the blow from descending.

I had two fishing lines. Their united length would reach the road. I took off my shirt, tore it into strips, tied them together, and then to the fish line. I then tied the end made out of my shirt around the rabbit's neck and let him out. He soon reached the end of the line, and I knew by the way he was pulling that he was making a desperate effort to escape. Soon the tugging ceased, and as I knew that gnawing was one of a rabbit's accomplishments, I thought he had gnawed himself loose. About three hours afterward I felt the line pull, and some one called. I tried to answer, but the feeble noise I made died away in the cavern. I then pulled the line a little to show that I was still alive. All grew still again, and I knew the person had gone for assistance. Then came the sound of voices. I pulled in the line and it brought me food. It took all the men who worked in the shaft nine hours to reach me.

A very large pine tree that stood near had been the cause of my misfortune. It had been dead a number of years, and the storm had blown it over. The terrible blow it struck the ground had caused the caving in of the shaft. The rabbit had wound the line around a bush and tied himself so short that he was imprisoned outside as securely as I had been inside. He was taken to town, put in a large cage, and supplied with all rabbit delicacies the market afforded. He, however, did not thrive, and the boys, believing he "pined in thought," voted to set him free. He was taken back to his old neighborhood, and liberated. He not only saved my life, but became the benefactor of all the rabbits near, the miners refraining from shooting any, for fear it might be my rabbit.

Lead Poisoning Among Workers.

The report of the United States Public Health service on this subject is now in press. The danger is chiefly to those handling the glaze; the lead is inhaled as dust, the lungs absorb lead from fumes, and there is some absorption through the skin. The use of leadless glazes, already established in European factories, would remedy the trouble, but this requires sweeping changes in our manufacturing and firing methods.—Scientific American.

A Freshman's Viewpoint.

At the close of the first week in an Indianapolis high school, a teacher asked members of a freshman class to write their impressions of their first day at the school.

"I came expecting to recite," wrote one youth, "but was deceived."

"My first impression reminded me of some cartoons, such as 'When a Feller Needs a Friend,' and 'Where Do We Go From Here.'" wrote another, who lacked the self-confidence that the first youth had displayed.

She recalled that Don had been presented to her, and he had not liked his dark, strik- e with its bold, prominent, glit- eyes and sinister lines; and she ot liked his suave, sweet, insin- voice or his subtle manner, with w bows and gestures.

"Don Carlos has been after Florence for a long time," said Alfred. "He's not a young man by any means. He's fifty, Bill says; but you can seldom tell a Mexican's age from his looks. Don Carlos is well educated and a man we know very little about. Mexicans of his stamp don't regard women as we white men do. Now, my dear, beautiful sister from New York, I haven't much use for Don Carlos; but I don't want Nels or Ambrose to make a wild throw with a rope and pull the Don off his horse. So you had better ride up to the house and stay there."

"Alfred, you are joking, teasing me," said Madeline.

"Indeed not," replied Alfred. "How about it, Flo?"

Florence replied that the cowboys would upon the slightest provocation treat Don Carlos with less ceremony and gentleness than a roped steer. Old Bill Stillwell came up to be importuned by Alfred regarding the conduct of cowboys on occasion, and he not only corroborated the assertion, but added emphasis and evidence of his own.

"An', Miss Majesty," he concluded, "I reckon if Gene Stewart was ridin' fer me, thet grinnin' Greaser would hev hed a bump in the dust before now."

Madeline had been wavering between sobriety and laughter until Stillwell's mention of his ideal of cowboy chivalry decided in favor of the laughter.

"I am not convinced, but I surrender," she said. "You have only some occult motive for driving me away. I am sure that handsome Don Carlos is being unjustly suspected. But as I have seen a little of cowboys' singular imagination and gallantry, I am rather inclined to fear their possibilities. So good-by."

Then she rode with Florence up the long, gray slope to the ranch-house. That night she suffered from excessive weariness, which she attributed more to the strange working of her mind than to riding and sitting her horse. Morning, however, found her in no disposition to rest. It was not activity that she craved, or excitement, or pleasure. An unerring instinct, rising clear from the thronging sensations of the last few days, told her that she had missed something in life. Whatever this something was, she had baffling intimations of it, hopes that faded on the verge of realizations, haunting promises that were unfulfilled. Whatever it was, it had remained hidden and unknown at home, and here in the West it began to allure and drive her to discovery. Therefore she could not rest; she wanted to go and see; she was no longer chasing phantoms; it was a hunt for treasure that held aloof, as intangible as the substance of dreams.

Upon the morning after the end of the round-up, when she went out on the porch, her brother and Stillwell appeared to be arguing about the identity of a horse.

"Wal, I reckon it's my old roan," said Stillwell, shading his eyes with his hand.

"Bill, if that isn't Stewart's horse my eyes are going back on me," replied Al. "It's not the color or shape—the distance is too far to judge by that. It's the motion—the swing."

"Al, mebbe you're right. But they ain't no rider up on thet hoss. Flo, fetch my glass."

Florence went into the house, while Madeline tried to discover the object of attention. Presently far up the gray hollow along a foothill she saw dust, and then the dark, moving figure of a horse. She was watching when Florence returned with the glass. Bill took a long look, adjusted the glasses carefully, and tried again.

"Wal, I hate to admit my eyes are gettin' pore. But I guess I'll hev to. Thet's Gene Stewart's hoss, saddled, an' comin' at a fast clip without a rider. It's amazin' strange, an' some in keepin' with other things concernin' Gene."

"Give me the glass," said Al. "Yes, I was right. Bill, the horse is not frightened. He's coming steadily; he's got something on his mind."

The wide hollow sloping up into the foothills lay open to unobstructed view, and less than half a mile distant Madeline saw the riderless horse coming along the white trail at a rapid canter. A shrill, piercing whistle pealed in.

"Wal, he's seen us, thet's sure," said Bill.

The horse neared the corrals, disappeared into a lane, and then, breaking his gait again, thundered into the inclosure and pounded to a halt some twenty yards from where Stillwell waited for him.

One look at him at close range in the clear light of day was enough for Madeline to award him a blue ribbon over all horses, even the prize-winner, White Stockings. The cowboy's great steed was no lithe, slender-bodied mustang. He was a charger, almost tremendous of build, with a black coat faintly mottled in gray, and it shone like polished glass in the sun. Evidently he had been carefully dressed down for this occasion, for there was no dust on him, nor a kink in his beautiful mane, nor a mark on his glossy hide.

"Come hyar, you son-of-a-gun," said Stillwell.

The horse dropped his head, snorted, and came obediently up. He was neither shy nor wild. Unhooking the stirrups from the pommel, Stillwell let them fall and began to search the saddle for something which he evidently expected to find. Presently from somewhere among the trappings he produced a folded bit of paper, and after scrutinizing it handed it to Al.

"Addressed to you; an' I'll bet you two bits I know what's in it," he said.

Alfred unfolded the letter, read it, and then looked at Stillwell.

"Bill, you're a pretty good guesser. Gene's made for the border. He sent the horse by somebody, no names mentioned, and wants my sister to have him if she will accept."

"Any mention of Danny Mains?" asked the rancher.

"Not a word."

"Thet's bad. Gene'd know about Danny if anybody did. But he's a close-mouthed cuss. So he's sure hittin' for Mexico. Wonder if Danny's goin', too? Wal, there's two of the best cowmen I ever seen, gone to h—l, an' I'm sorry."

With that he bowed his head and, grumbling to himself, went into the house. Alfred lifted the reins over the head of the horse and, leading him to Madeline, slipped the knot over her arm and placed the letter in her hand.

"Majesty, I'd accept the horse," he said. "Stewart is only a cowboy now, and as tough as any I've known. But he comes of a good family. He was a college man and a gentleman once. He went to the bad out here, like so many fellows go, like I nearly did. Then he had told me about his sister and mother. He cared a good deal for them. I think he has been a source of unhappiness to them. It was mostly when he was reminded of this in some way that he'd get drunk. I have always stuck to him, and I would do so yet if I had a chance. You read the letter, sister, and accept the horse."

In silence Madeline bent her gaze from her brother's face to the letter:

"Friend Al: I'm sending my horse down to you because I'm going away and haven't the nerve to take him where he'd get hurt or fall into strange hands.

"If you think it's all right, why, give him to your sister with my respects. But if you don't like the idea, Al, or if she won't have him, then he's for you. I'm hoping your sister will take him. She'll be good to him, and she can afford to take care of him. And, while I'm waiting to be plugged by a Greaser bullet, if I happen to have a picture in mind of how she'll look upon my horse, why, man, it's not going to make any difference to you. She needn't ever know it.

"Between you and me, Al, don't let her or Flo ride alone over Don Carlos' way. If I had time I could tell you something about that slick Greaser. And tell your sister, if there's ever any reason for her to run away from anybody when she's up on that roan, just let her lean over and yell in his ear. She'll find herself riding the wind. So long.

"GENE STEWART."

Madeline thoughtfully folded the letter and murmured, "How he must love his horse!"

"Well, I should say so," replied Alfred. "Flo will tell you. She's the only person Gene ever let ride that horse. Well, sister mine, how about it—will you accept the horse?"

"Assuredly. And very happy indeed am I to get him. Al, you said,

"How He Must Love His Horse!"

I think, that Mr. Stewart named him after me—saw my nickname in the New York paper?"

"Yes."

"Well, I will not change his name. But, Al, how shall I ever climb up on him? He's taller than I am. What a giant of a horse! Oh, look at him—he's nosing my hand. I really believe he understood what I said. Al, did you ever see such a splendid head and such beautiful eyes? They are so large and dark and soft—and human. Oh, I am a fickle woman, for I am forgetting White Stockings."

"I'll gamble he'll make you forget any other horse," said Alfred. "You'll have to get on him from the porch."

Madeline led the horse to and fro, and was delighted with his gentleness. She discovered that he did not need to be led. He came at her call, followed her like a pet dog, rubbed his black muzzle against her. Sometimes, at the turns in their walk, he lifted his head and with ears forward looked up the trail by which he had come, and beyond the foothills. He was looking over the range. Someone was calling to him, perhaps, from beyond the mountains. Madeline liked him the better for that memory, and pitied the wayward cowboy who had parted with his only possession for very love of it.

At supper-time Madeline was unusually thoughtful. Later, when they assembled on the porch to watch the sunset, Stillwell's humorous complainings inspired the inception of an idea which flashed up in her mind swift as lightning. And then by listening sympathetically she encouraged him to recite the troubles of a poor cattleman. They were many and long and interesting, and rather numbing to the life of her inspired idea.

"Mr. Stillwell, could ranching here on a large scale, with up-to-date methods, be made—well, not profitable, exactly, but to pay—to run without loss?" she asked, determined to kill her new-born idea at birth or else give it breath and hope of life.

"Wal, I reckon it could," he replied, with a short laugh. "It'd sure be a money-maker. Why, with all my bad luck an' poor equipment I've lived pretty well an' paid my debts an' haven't lost any money except the original outlay. I reckon thet's sunk fer good."

"Would you sell—if someone would pay your price?"

"Miss Majesty, I'd jump at the chance. Yet somehow I'd hate to leave hyar. I'd jest be fool enough to go sink the money in another ranch."

"Would Don Carlos and these other Mexicans sell?"

"They sure would. The Don has been after me fer years, wantin' to sell thet old rancho of his; an' these herders in the valley with their stray cattle, they'd fall daid at sight of a little money."

"Please tell me, Mr. Stillwell, exactly what you would do here if you had unlimited means?" went on Madeline.

"Good Lud!" ejaculated the rancher. "Wall, Miss Majesty, it jest makes my old heart warm up to think of such a thing. I dreamed a lot when I first come hyar. What would I do if I hed unlimited money? Listen. I'd buy out Don Carlos an' the Greasers. I'd give a job to every good cowman in this country. I'd make them prosper as I prospered myself. I'd buy all the good horses on the ranges. I'd fence twenty thousand acres of the best grazin'. I'd drill fer water in the valley. I'd pipe water down from the mountains. I'd dam up that draw out there. A mile-long dam from hill to hill would give me a big lake, an' hevin' an eye fer beauty, I'd plant cottonwoods around it. I'd fill that lake full of fish. I'd put in the biggest field of alfalfa in the Southwest. I'd plant fruit-trees an' garden. I'd tear down them old corrals an' barns an' bunkhouses to build new ones. I'd make this old rancho some comfortable an' fine. I'd put in grass an' flowers all around an' bring young pine trees down from the mountains. An' when all thet was done I'd sit in my chair an' smoke an' watch the cattle stringin' in fer water an' straggiin' back into the valley. An' thet red sun out there wouldn't set on a happier man in the world than Bill Stillwell, last of the old cattlemen."

Madeline thanked the rancher, and then rather abruptly retired to her room, where she felt no restraint to hide the force of that wonderful idea, now full-grown and tenacious and alluring.

Upon the next day, late in the afternoon, she asked Alfred if it would be safe for her to ride out to the mesa.

"I'll go with you," he said gayly.

"Dear fellow, I want to go alone," she replied.

"Ah!" Alfred exclaimed, suddenly serious. He gave her just a quick glance, then turned away. "Go ahead. I think it's safe. I'll make it safe by sitting here with my glass and keeping an eye on you. Be careful coming down the trail. Let the horse pick his way. That's all."

She rode Majesty across the wide flat, up the zigzag trail, across the beautiful grassy level to the far rim of the mesa, and not till then did she lift her eyes to face the southwest. In that darkening desert there was something illimitable. Madeline saw the hollow of a stupendous hand; she felt a mighty hold upon her heart. Out of the endless space, out of silence and desolation and mystery and age, came slow-changing colored shadows, phantoms of peace, and they whispered to Madeline. They whispered that it was a great, grim, immutable earth; that time was eternity; that life was fleeting. They whispered for her to be a woman; to love someone before it was too late; to love anyone, everyone; to realize the need of work, and thus find happiness.

She rode back across the mesa and down the trail, and, once more upon the flat, she called to the horse and made him run. His spirit seemed to race with hers. The wind of his speed blew her hair from its fastenings. When he thundered to a halt at the porch steps Madeline, breathless and disheveled, alighted with the mass of her hair tumbling around her.

Alfred met her, and his exclamation, and Florence's rapt eyes shining on her face, and Stillwell's speechlessness made her self-conscious. Laughing, she tried to put up the mass of hair.

"My hat—and my combs—went to the wind. I thought—my hair would go, too. . . . There is the evening star. . . . I think I am very hungry."

And then she gave up trying to fasten up her hair, which fell again in a golden mass.

"Mr. Stillwell," she began, and paused, strangely aware of a hurried note, a deeper ring in her voice. "Mr. Stillwell, I want to buy your ranch—to engage you as my superintendent. I want to buy Don Carlos' ranch and other property to the extent, say, of fifty thousand acres. I want you to buy horses and cattle—in short, to make all those improvements which you said you had so long dreamed of. Then I have ideas of my own, in the development of which I must have your advice and Alfred's. I intend to better the condition of those poor Mexicans in the valley. I intend to make life a little more worth living for them and for the cowboys of this range. Tomorrow we shall talk it all over, plan all the business details."

Madeline turned from the huge, ever-widening smile that beamed down upon her and held out her hands to her brother.

"Alfred, strange, is it not, my coming out to you? Nay, don't smile. I hope I have found myself—my work, my happiness—here under the light of that western star."

CHAPTER VII

Her Majesty's Rancho.

Five months brought all that Stillwell had dreamed of, and so many more changes and improvements and innovations that it was as if a magic touch had transformed the old ranch. Madeline and Alfred and Florence had talked over a fitting name, and had decided on one chosen by Madeline. But this instance was the only one in the course of developments in which Madeline's wishes were not complied with. The cowboys named the new ranch "Her Majesty's Rancho." Stillwell said the names cowboys bestowed were felicitous, and as unchangeable as the everlasting hills; Florence went over to the enemy; and Alfred, laughing at Madeline's protest, declared the cowboys had elected her queen of the ranges, and that there was no help for it. So the name stood "Her Majesty's Rancho."

All that had been left of the old Spanish house which had been Stillwell's home for so long was the bare, massive structure, and some of this had been cut away for new doors and windows. Every modern convenience, even to hot and cold running water and acetylene light, had been installed; and the whole interior painted and carpentered and furnished. The ideal sought had not been luxury, but comfort. Every door into the patio looked out upon dark, rich grass and sweet-faced flowers, and every window looked down the green slopes.

Madeline Hammond cherished a fancy that the transformation she had wrought in the old Spanish house and in the people with whom she had surrounded herself, great as that transformation had been, was as nothing compared to the one wrought in herself. She had found an object in life. She had seen her brother through his difficulties, on the road to all the success and prosperity that he cared for. Madeline had been a conscientious student of ranching and an apt pupil of Stillwell. The old cattleman, in his simplicity, gave her the place in his heart that was meant for the daughter he had never had. His pride in her, Madeline thought, was beyond reason or belief or words to tell. Under his guidance, sometimes accompanied by Alfred and Florence, Madeline had ridden the ranges and had studied the life and work of the cowboys. Sometimes she looked in her mirror and laughed with sheer joy at sight of the lithe, audacious, brown-faced, flashing-eyed creature reflected there. It was not so much joy in her beauty as sheer joy of life. Eastern critics had been wont to call he beautiful in those days when she had been pale and slender and proud and cold. She laughed. If they could only see her now! From the tip of her golden head to her feet she was alive, pulsating, on fire.

"Stewart, it's a shame to waste your life. Come back with me!"

McRAE PRAISES THE LEGION

Past Commander of First Post in the United States Finds Bride, Also Former Leader.

Kenneth H. McRae, a past commander of the first American Legion post to be organized in the United States, lays claim that the Legion is an organization for service. From his activities in the Veterans' association, he has obtained many benefits, but he believes the utmost in service was rendered when association with Legion affairs provided him with a wife!

McRae, who was active in the doings of George Washington post in Washington, D. C., was thrown into frequent association with the commanders of the other posts in the city. He met Miss Lois May Beach, a past commander of the U. S. S. Jacob Jones post, composed entirely of "yeomanettes," or, as they were known during the war, Yeomen (F). Miss Beach had successfully guided the affairs of her post for a year and had left an active duty station in the naval reserve force at the close of her term of Legion leadership.

Soon romance between the two

Kenneth H. McRae.

Legion members budded, and within a few months Legionnaires in the capital were invited to attend a wedding ceremony which united the two.

Mrs. McRae enrolled in the United States Naval Reserve force on April 8, 1918, and served in the navy department until February 15 of this year. McRae served with Nebraska troops in France and has been very active in Legion affairs. He is now historian of his post.

MUST PROTECT OUR CITIZENS

National Adjutant of American Legion Declares Foreign Labor Should Not Be Given Preference.

Substitution of foreign for American labor was declared contrary to the interests of America by Lemuel Bolles, national adjutant of the American Legion, in a recent letter to the commander of the Legion post at Medford, Ore., which recently protested against the discharge of Americans and the employment of Japanese laborers on a large fruit orchard near the town.

"We must be ever alert to protect the interests of American citizens against the encroachment of those from foreign lands who have in mind, in coming here, nothing but the enrichment of themselves at the expense of our people and of our resources," the letter stated. "Our people must be made secure in the American standard of living and in the enjoyment of satisfactory working conditions. This is impossible unless the influx of all aliens from all lands is checked."

Vigorous and united action is necessary as a measure of prevention, according to the Legion national adjutant, "first in the education of all our people so that they may present a united front against the efforts being made to promote further foreign immigration; second, in the enforcement of all laws, particularly those designed to regulate the number of immigrants reaching our shores annually, or to totally exclude them, and third, the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to preserve America for those who are capable of appreciating and becoming worthy citizens of the Republic."

WELCOME TO ALL FOREIGNERS

Distinction Between Foreign-Born and Americans to Be Erased at Sioux Falls, S. D.

Harold B. Mason Post of the American Legion is fostering a plan for Americanization in Sioux Falls, S. D., where a "community center" has just been formed for the purpose.

Working through the schools, it is planned by the Legion men and coworkers along the same line that all distinctions between foreign-born and native Americans will be erased. A committee of 12, representing as many organizations offering co-operation in the city, joined with the American Legion in the plan, and a special worker of the local school force was employed to direct the work of the "community center."

This will be conducted in the form of an institute with set talks on Americanization for foreign-born residents of Sioux Falls, schooling in citizenship for American-born, and other subjects. Special programs will be rendered at each session and as an added attraction refreshments will be served those who attend.

CHINCH BUGS TO GORN SOON

Farmers Report Presence of Milions of Insects in Southern Part of State.

This is a cinch bug year in Iowa. Dr. Carl J. Drake, state entomologist at Ames, says the insects are being reported in large numbers in fields in the southern part of the state and especially in the southeastern corner. Farmers report having seen literally millions of the bugs in wheat and grass.

The young bugs, which are now on the wheat plants. do considerable damage, but their ravages are much more striking and more serious later in the season, following harvest. When the wheat is cut, this first generation of bugs, which have short wings and are unable to fly, will make their way on foot to the cornfields.

Chinch bugs spend the winter in hedge rows, old grass and the like and for this reason one of the methods of control reccomended is to destroy these breeding places in the fall. It is too late now, however, to make use of preventive measures for this season. The next move now is to trap the bugs when they leave the wheat fields at harvest time. The usual way of doing this, according to Dr. Drake, is to make use of either the dust barrier or the tar line. the idea in either case being to form a "dead" beyond which they bugs are unable to pass in their search for food.

Details concerning the construction and handling of these barriers may be had from the county agents or from Dr. Drake's office.

TIME FOR THIRD SPRAY

The third spray should be applied to fruit trees ten days to two weeks after the second spray, which will be from June 11 to June 15 in this county.

The Spray should be prepared at the rate of 4½ quarts of lime sulphur and 1 pound of lead arsenate to 50 gallons of water. This is for the control of the codling moth, apple scab, apple blotch and curculio.

It is only necessary to spray the trees which have set a crop of fruit at this time.

The apples have grown considerably, and as the insects and disease are still present, it is necessary to give them a good coating of spray material for protection.

RADIO NO LONGER PLAYTHING

When a Chicago boy can sit down at a table in his own home and talk by radio with boys in Iowa, Pennsylvania and other states, and probably in the near future, with other nations, he is pretty likely to be more interested in that than in he pool room down the street.

Two years ago radio was considered more as a plaything for the amatuer electrical inventor except where it was used by government experts.

Today it is almost a household word and the present generation of youngsters discuss radio apparatus, broadcasting stations, etc., in a language which their elders do not understand.

Radio as a means of reaching every nook and corner of he world instantly is going to be one of the greatest civilizing influences ever be stowed upon mankind.

Don't laugh at the boy when he talks about radio. Help him set up his little set and take an interest in it yourself, and before you know it you will be talking the same language as the boy and interesting yourself in affairs you never dreamed of.

CAMP FIRE GIRLS

BY FLORENCE BEHRINGER

The Camp Fire girls enjoyed a hike to the Goodell woods, on Friday morning, las week.

The girls met at the Park about 7:30 a. m.

Songs were sang on the way and they reached the woods about 10:00 After walking through the woods for a time, a place was selected to eat dinner.

After dinner some of the girls went fishing; others told stories to pass the afternoon away.

A camp fire was built to cook supper. After supper the girls started home.

While walking home songs were sang and all reported a good time.

The girls reached home about 8:30 p. m.

The next Camp Fire Meeting will be held on the evening of June 21st.

The girls will meet in the basement of the First National Bank at 7:00 p. m.

All those wishing to become Wood Gatherers are asked to be present at this meeting.

Lucky Bill's show at Corwith last was well attended as everybady fell for the reputation of the show established five years ago but the only lucky ones were the few who failed to attend. In their former appearance they put up a good show but this trip it was just as poor as it was good before. They claim to have been having bad luck as their elephants went on a strike and became unmanageable. The laughing hynea bit off the kangaroo's tail, the kangaroo rebelled on going tailess so it laid down and died. An excowboy from North Dakota, who is working on a farm near Corwith, rode with ease their bucking bronchoes so that the poor show did not have one redeeming feature.

U. S. GOVRNMENT DOING GOOD WORK ON ROADS

FEDERAL AID PUBLIC HIGHWAYS WILL PLACE AMERICA ON GOOD ROADS

When Completed System Will Link Up all Towns of 5,000 or Over

WASHINGTON, June 14,— In an address upon the subject of public highways delivered before the American Automobile Association, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace recently gave some very interesting facts and figures in connection with the operation of the federal road act. Among other interesting data funished by Secretary Wallace in the course of his remarks were the following:

"The designation and approval of the Federal Aid Highway System under the act of 1921 is progressing rapidly. By the end of the summer approximately 179,000 miles will have designated as a part of this system. Up to May 5 all but three states had submitted tentative systems for approval. The systems of thirty-three states had been formally aproved, including a total of 105-406 miles.

"Considering the approved systems in the thirtythree states we find that of the 1,015 cities of 5,000 or more populaion in these states 959 of them lie directly on the approved system, and there is not one but will be connected by an approved state or county road. When the system is completed. therefore, one will be able to travel from any town of 5.-000 population or greater to any other town of the same population without leaving an approved road.

"The detailed study of the availability of the improved roads to the total population has not been completed, but if we take typical states in the East, Middle West and West, we find that the roads on the Federal Aid System will give a maximum service. In Maryland not more than 2½ per cent of the population lives furthur than ten miles from a federal aid road in Indian less than 1 per cent; in Arizona, where the total population is but 334,000, perhaps one-third will live outside the ten-mile zone.

"A federal aid road will cross the Western mountains at practically every important pass.

"In designating the routes to be included in the federal aid system the chief aim of the states and the federal agency has been to select routes which will give the maximum of local service and at the same time connect with one another to form a great national highway system The states were first asked to certify the total mileage of the road in existance at the time of the act. Seven per cent of this was the maximum allowable milage that could be included in this system. The total mileage was 194,262 miles. The states were then asked to prepare maps of the state systems proposed by them, locating the roads by controlling points. These state systems were carefully reviewed and studied by the department and some changes were suggested as desirable from the national point of view. Conferences were held between representatives of the department and of the states, and out of hese conferences came agreement as to the systems finally decided upon.

" Federal aid for road building was inaugerated by the federal aid road act. approved July 11, 1916

COUNTY LEGION WILL HOLD PICNIC THURSDAY

NEW CREAM GRADES IN USE

Present Regulations on Cream Buying Place Premium on Product Having High Quality.

The new regulations for cream grading. designed to reward the diaryman who produces the high grade cream, are now being put into effect over the state, generally.

Prior to this time the farmer producing clean, sweat cream has been paid no more than the farmer producing filthy, sour cream, provided the cream was at all accepted and the tests were the same.

The new system aims to furnish an incentive to produce quality cream. It is believed that this system of grading will do more toward influencing the quality of cream upward than any other plan that has been devised.

Under the new system the first and highest grade of cream is known as "extras", which must consist of sweet cream, clean in flavor and must not contain more than .2 per cent acidity.

What is really the second grade is known as "firsts" and consists of cream that is clean, smooth, free of all undesirable odors. clean to the taste may be slightly sour and must not have more than .4 per cent acidity.

The next class, known as "seconds" consists of cream which is too sour to grade as firsts. It may contain undesirable odors or flavors to a slight degree, and also includes cream which is too old to pass as firsts. All sour cream cream containing less than 28 percent of butterfat is graded as "seconds'.

What may, in a way be considered a fourth grade is the illegal cream which either has been produced by unhealthy cows or is in some way unsuitable for human consumption This class of cream can not be bought or sold.

SOVIET SEEKS U.S. RECOGNITION

Lenine Ready to Wipe Out the Old Czarist Debt of $232,000,000.

HUGHES FIRM ON DEMANDS

State Department at Washington Stands on Requirements Cabled to the Consul at Reval on March 25, 1921.

Washington, June 9.—That the soviet government is making an attempt to buy recognition from the United States through payment of the $232,000,000 owed this government, is the burden of communications brought to America by Senator Wheeler of Montana, and Parley P. Christensen, Farmer-Labor candidate for president in 1920. Their representations will be brought to the attention of the State department soon.

Senator Wheeler and Mr. Christensen do not put it on that basis. Having talked to officials of the soviet government, they are prepared to represent to Secretary Hughes that Russia will meet all the conditions of recognition imposed by this government in addition to paying its debt. But the lure for negotiations which Mr. Lenin and Mr. Trotzky held out to them on their recent trip through Russia was payment of the $232,000,000 which this government had not expected to recover, at least for many years.

There have been indications recently that the State department has been approached from other angles with this same proposal, although the department will not confirm this. It is said that Secretary Hughes does not take seriously the talk of negotiations that might lead to recognition of the soviet government for he realizes that for the soviets to meet the requirements of the United States would mean virtual abandonment of some of the cardinal principles of their system.

The requirements as stated most tersely through Secretary Hughes' cablegram to the American consul at Reval on March 25, 1921, are:

Safety of life and property.

Recognition by firm guarantees of private property.

Sanctity of contract.

Right of free labor.

Furthermore, Secretary Hughes states in the same cablegram, that "this government will be glad to have convincing evidence of the consummation of such changes, and until this evidence is supplied this government is unable to perceive that there is any proper basis for considering trade relations."

PEACE TALK USELESS

France and Belgium to Increase Pressure on Germans.

Conference Sticks to Demand for Abandonment of Ruhr Resistance —Theunis Demands Seven Billions Gold Marks.

Brussels, June 7.—The Franco-Belgian conference, which began here, decided not to consider Germany's last reparation note until German passive resistance against the Franco-Belgian invasion of the Ruhr is ended.

An official statement to this effect was issued. The conference includes Premiers Poincare and Theunis and various French and Belgian cabinet members, generals and other leaders. Just as the conference opened, Germany's latest note, offering annual reparations payments of 1,500,000,000 marks, was received.

Instead of paying any attention to the note, the conferees decided to devise ways to increase the pressure on Germany.

Premier Theunis submitted to Premier Poincare a reparations plan under which Belgium would accept 7,000,000,000 gold marks in payment of her claims on Germany.

The Belgian plan also provides for an international consortium to operate the railways of Germany for sixty years and to pay 1,900,000,000 gold marks a year to the reparations commission. Exploitation of German alcohol, sugar, tobacco and match monopolies by international companies is also suggested by Belgium.

JAP POLICE TAKE UNION LEADERS

Also Seize and Search Buildings of the Wasoda University.

COLLEGE PAPER SUPPRESSED

Government Takes Drastic Action Against the Spread of Red Propaganda—Would Check Influx of Russian Communists.

Tokyo, June 8.—The police activities against the socialists are now extending to labor, two prominent union heads being under arrest. It is expected that there will be many more arrests, including writers on labor topics.

The police deny that there was anything serious behind the recent socialist and communist disclosures, asserting that the raids were made to nip any plotting in the bud. During the raids the police searched the buildings of Waseda university, which was the scene of disorders recently when a portion of the faculty tried to organize a militaristic association among the students.

The university paper has been suppressed temporarily and some professors have resigned, while the students have called a mass meeting to protest against the police interference with "liberty of learning."

It is suggested in some quarters that the police raids are largely political, in view of probable negotiations with the soviet government, being intended to show the danger from an influx of communists.

Premier Kato replied to an outline by Joffe, soviet representative in China and Japan, of Moscow's conditions for a resumption of the parley between the two nations. The cabinet continues to insist on Russian acceptance of responsibility for the Nikolaievsk massacre as a condition for the evacuation of Sakhalin island. In addition the cabinet insists that the Russians give guarantees that they will not carry on propaganda in Japan and also that they give guarantees for the safety of Japanese lives and property in Russia.

WHO'S WHO—and WHERE

"Flo" Leeds Revives the Stillman Case

"Flo" Leeds, corespondent in James A. Stillman divorce case, is from a trip abroad. She was detained at the pier three hours by customs inspectors, because she could not prove the $50,000 worth of jewels in her possession were bought in the United States.

"I have come back rejuvenated mentally, physically and spiritually. I feel much better. I never did think really very wrong. The world will understand some day," she told reporters. Mrs. Leeds traveled aboard ship under the assumed name of "Mrs. K. Lincoln," and few aboard knew her identity.

Coincident with her return is gossip in great variety concerning the celebrated divorce case. Mrs. Leeds says Stillman has deserted her for a new lady friend; that he has discontinued payments for the support of her son; that she is broke as far as cash is concerned. She hinted that she may sue the banker to force him to support the four-year-old boy, Jay.

A third woman, Mrs. Joseph T. Talbert, widow of a Chicago-New York banker, is mentioned in the gossip.

Stillman's friends make the retort courteous by saying that he "gave her a million," in one form or another, and that she and Jay are in no danger of the poorhouse.

Gossip also had it that Mrs. Stillman and Mrs. Leeds might get together to do something or other to make Stillman uncomfortable.

Gould Millions Cause Complication

A new portrait of Mrs. George J. Gould, widow of the American financier who died recently in France, is given herewith. The first wife, Edith Kingdon Gould, died suddenly on the golf links in November, 1921. The following May he married Guinevere Jeanne Sinclair at Lakewood, N. J. Immediately afterward the couple went to Europe to make their permanent home.

Mr. Gould's seven children by his first wife, Edith Kingdon Gould, were: Kingdon Gould, Jay Gould II, Marjorie Gould (Mrs. Anthony J. Drexel), Vivian Gould (Lady Decies), George Gould, Edith Gould (Mrs. C. L. Wainwright) and Gloria Gould.

American gossip has it that high society and high finance both probably will be stirred by a bitter fight over the estate left by George J. Gould. Three children born to Mr. Gould's second wife, are expected to be the focal point of the contest. A supplementary action meantime will be defended by the eexcutors of the deceased in the suit involving George Jay Gould's counting for the $80,000,000 estate of his father, the late Jay Gould.

European gossip has it George J. Gould may have been another "victim of the curse of the Pharaohs." Gould and his second wife visited Tut-Ankh-Amen's tomb when Lord Carnarvon was engaged in opening it. Symptoms similar to the strange malady which caused the death of Lord Carnarvon developed in Gould. His lungs became affected and his illness was diagnosed as pneumonia.

Chief Collins of the Chicago Police

Herewith is a good portrait of Chicago's new chief of police, Morgan Collins. He has been in the police for a generation and has a national acquaintance with police authorities. Just now Chief Collins is a busy man in his effort to clamp down the lid and clean up the city. The Chicago crime commission's latest report says his efforts are being successful. There are fewer burglaries, robberies and murders and the percentage of penalties inflicted in the criminal courts has risen.

"The attitude of the public toward crime continues to become less tolerant," said Henry Barrett Chamberlin of the commission. "The activities of the new police administration, the improving conditions as regards enforcing agencies are the most important factors."

Chief Collins has established an advisory board of police captains acting as a public hearing board and the reformers are having an inning. They propose the addition of a number of chaplains to the force; a juvenile department to watch over youngsters; the employment of radio to capture thieves and other criminals; a card index of criminals, and so on.

Husband of Krupp Heiress in Prison

The heavy prison sentences imposed by the recent court-martial upon Dr. Krupp von Bohlen (portrait herewith) and the other Krupp directors tried for instigating opposition to the French at the Krupp plant at the time of the shooting have been confirmed by the court of revision. The convicted men will be transferred to prisons in France while their counsel appeals to the court of cassation.

Dr. von Bohlen, who married the Krupp heiress, was tried by a French court-martial for conspiracy against the public order and the security of the French forces of occupation. He was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment at hard labor.

Directors Bruhn, Hartwig and Oesterlen were given fifteen years each. Four other Krupp officials—Schaeffer, Cuntz, Bauer and Schraepler—who were accused of taking their action from unoccupied territory, received additional sentences of five years each because of their absence. In addition to imprisonment, the court imposed a fine of 100,000,000 marks—$3,000—on the accused.

THE BEST THE FARMS PRODUCE

By WALTER W. HEAD

First Vice-President, American Bankers Association

Walter W. Head

Every banker and business man in the country is interested in the farm from another viewpoint than merely a place to raise farm products and livestock. Above all the farm is one of the places where we can best bring up our boys and girls. Thousands of men and boys each year are flocking to the city. Clerks in the city are barely eking out an existence and they cannot expect to receive much more in the way of compensation.

But back on the farms are men working for a reasonable return, and in addition they have their houses, the wonderful sunshine above in the daytime, the wonderful fresh air and all the things that the soil produces. The boy who is raised on the farm will have an entirely different aspect of life and approach the various problems with which he has to deal in later years in a different way from the boy who is raised in the city.

In this period of unrest we are certainly vitally interested in rearing both on the farms and in the cities boys and girls with the proper outlook for the future, imbued with the belief that the activity in which they are engaged is, after all, something that will provide them both with the necessary things of life and with happiness. For in happiness there is contentment, and in contentment in America there is safety for our institutions.

Every single banker should feel that the problems his farmer customers have to contend with are not only the farmer's problems but his problems as well. He should feel not only that the farmer must be prosperous so that he can deposit more in his bank, giving the banker more to loan and thereby increasing his profits, but that also there is something which cannot be measured in dollars and cents. It is the thought of rendering such service to their customers—regardless of whether they are farmers, or men working in the shops, or big business men of the cities—that will bring not only prosperity but contentment as well. The banker should take as his motto: "Who serves best profits most."

Co-operative Marketing

Agriculture produces enough to feed the people the year around but some of this production should be stored to eliminate the over supply at the times of harvest or during periods of high production. It can then be thrown upon the market in accordance with consumptive demands.

Co-operative marketing is still in its infancy. In a few localities where farmers have been properly organized and provided themselves with adequate facilities to store their products they have been able to considerably stabilize prices, to the advantage of both producer and consumer.

Farmers are looking for a scientific merchandising basis upon which to market their products. It is extremely important that they organize rightly on the commodity basis and secure efficient capable management and adequate financing. This cannot be done in a day, a week, or a month, nor in five or even ten years. It must be by gradual growth and development. The problem is so important it demands the best thought of not only farmers but educators, bankers and other business men.—Banker-Farmer.

THE SERVICE OF A FAILURE

BY J. H. PUELICHER

President American Bankers Association

J. H. Puelicher

When Governor Walton of Oklahoma signed recently the repeal of the bank deposit guaranty law in that state, he performed an economic service to the whole country. I might even say that Oklahoma in passing that law, enduring its evil consequences for fifteen years and then frankly casting it aside as a failure, has performed an economic service to the nation. There could be no more convincing argument against the passage of similar laws in other states than Oklahoma's disastrous experiment.

The Oklahoma guaranty law was the first of its kind. It was enacted in response to the panic of 1907. But experience has only proved again that there is no substitute for sound banking. Relying on the fancied security of the guaranty law, people entrusted their banking to many who were unfit for the trust. Bank failures have been so many that the fund, supposed to guarantee deposits, created by assessments on banks, was long ago depleted.

It is estimated that with total liabilities created under the law in the form of warrants and sums owing to depositors amounting to $12,000,000, there are in the hands of the Banking Board uncertain assets of nominally $15,000,000, ranging in value from zero to only thirty or forty cents on the dollar, resulting in a deficit of many million dollars. Sound, well-managed banks have been heavily taxed by assessments to the fund, and the maximum amount that could be assessed on solvent banks is insufficient to cover the deficit.

It has been well said that guaranty laws make for looseness in banking methods, and saddle on the competent and honest the sins of the incompetent and dishonest.

Let us have only laws that raise the standard of banking. Let us have no laws that debase it.

NEED FOR UNIFORMITY IN BUSINESS LAWS

How Collection of Just Debts May Be Prevented by Differing State Statutes.

An effort to bring about better coordination and greater uniformity among state laws dealing with business and banking is being made by the American Bankers Association.

It is pointed out that, although the country is a unit commercially, and citizens of any one state may do business that reaches all over the country, most laws governing business transactions are made by the different states, with application limited to their own local jurisdictions and often in conflict with laws in other states. It is held that state laws should be uniform so that the same transaction will not be subject to different sets of rules according as state laws differ.

To illustrate the disadvantages of conflicting laws, the following illustration is given: Mr. Jones lives in New York where the statute of limitations outlaws a note in six years. He falls into the error of assuming that the same rule prevails everywhere. He visits Maryland and loans $1,000 to his friend, Mr. Smith, taking a promissory note. As the note carries interest Mr. Jones is in no hurry for his money and he believes Smith to be financially responsible. Finally at the end of four years Jones concludes he has loaned Smith the money long enough and seeks to collect the note from him. But Smith can deny liability and point to the statute of Maryland which Jones is surprised to learn outlaws a note after three years.

Changes Recommended

The particular subjects of legislation recommended by the association for enactment by State legislatures during 1923 include uniform acts on negotiable instruments, bills of lading, warehouse receipts, stock transfer, and fiduciaries.

Under the head of laws for better protection of banks in particular transactions are proposed measures dealing with limiting liability on certified check; instruments based on gambling or usurious consideration; time limit on stop payment; payment of stale check; adverse claim to bank deposit; payment of forged or raised check; deposits in two names; deposits in trust; competency of bank and corporation notaries; non-payment of check through error; Saturday afternoon bank transactions, and forwarding check direct to payor.

Under the Federal Reserve and foreign banking are recommended laws on membership of state institutions in Federal Reserve System, and foreign banking. Penal laws proposed deal with false statements for credit; slander and libel of bank; checks or drafts without funds, and burglary with explosives.

THE HORSE'S SPEED LIMIT

Before our agarian population had taken so enthusiastically to the automobile, two farmers drove into town in an old spring wagon pulled ed by a very bony old nag. The lit- tle burg had been incorporated, and among the evidences of this was a brand-new sign at the town line: "Speed limit, 10 miles an hour." Observing this, the. driver began whipping up his steed vigorously.

The German mark has been last re ported as worth 79,000 to the dollar. Just why after getting down to this sort of a figure they are still treated as worth figuring at all and are not merely weighed up by the pound as having so much value for re manufacture into clean paper, is some- thing beyond us; but having started out to beat their creditors by destroy ing he value of currency in which their creditors were to be paid, the Germans may be said to have done a thorough job of financiering such as it is. Furthurmore the scheme has worked with respect to the do- mestic creditors of Germany, and every German who had and account in the savings bank, an accumula- tion with an insurance company or an invesment put away in ordinary securities is ruined, so far as such account, accumulation or investment may be concerned. Foreign credi- tors, however, do not take the mat- ter it that way, and hence he pre- sent occupation of the Ruhr for the purposes of liquidation. Of course back of this condition is the circum- stance that the Germans started the war on a basis of free and easy loans which were o be paid out of the spoil of France, Belgium, Britain and ulti mately America, and the outcome of the war was a piece of utter miscal- culation to which the Germans have never been able mentally and moral- ly to adjust themselves.

FOR ARAINY DAY

It is common sense for the indiv- idual to make personal preparation for any economic depression which may come. Each individual can do so by the exercise a little self-denial for the moment. If each will put part of the present day income into savings banks or government bonds, which are almost at par and still pay more than 4 per cent, there will be much less misery when the tide of prosperity ebbs. We do not op- pose the purchase of silk shirts or flivvers, or patronage of moving pic- tures and similiar entertainment. We are for those things. The work- ing man or woman has. as much right to the luxuries he or she can buy as any one, and more than some. In so far as they do buy these things they help maintain prosperity. But common sense and the experience of very recent years should indicate to them that there is a path beween exravagence and parsimony.—Chic- ago Tribune.

ELECTRIC FAN SHOULD BE TUN. ED UP NOW

With the hot weather but a few weeks of, it soon will be time to take the old electric fan from its place of storage and get it tuned up for the seasons run. Before the fan is put to steady use for the summer, it should be carefuly inspected and overhauled if it is to do its work ec- onomically, according to the depart- ment of trades industries at Iowa State College.

In overhauling the fan the first thing that should be done is to take a rag dampened in kerosene or gas- oline and wipe the dust off all parts that are accessible from the outside.

Perhaps the most important parts of the fan to watch are the bearings A little attention to these may pre- vent a blown out fuse and will ex- tend materially the life of the fan. If the bearings are found to be the least bit loose replace. them with new ones. A slight end play of from 1-16 to 1-8 of an inch is not regard- ed as objectionable, but a smaller amount of side play will cause the motor to hum and sooner or later will over heat the windings.

..The grease cups should be filled with vaseline and kept filled all sum mer. The cord leading to the fan should be inspected for loose con- tacts and broken wires, especially where the cord enters the plug at- tached to the motor frame. The fan guard should be examined to see that it is in place and securely fast- ened. Failure to take this precaut- ion may result in a bent fan blade or injured fingers.

NATION REPRESENTED AT FINANCE CAPITAL

By FRANCIS H. SISSON
Chairman Public Relations Commission, American Bankers Association.

F. H. Sisson

Financial New York is peculiarly representative of the whole nation. All parts of the country, the small towns as well as the big cities, have supplied the greater part of the man power and brain power enabling it to function as the nation's financial capital.

A recent investigation as to the origin of one hundred leading executives in the New York financial district, showed that no less than sixty per cent were born outside New York State, that no less than twenty-eight per cent were born in towns of 5,000 or less, and only twenty per cent were born in New York City.

The birthplaces of these men represented Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Michigan, Missouri, Illinois, Maryland, Delaware, Vermont, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, Minnesota, Iowa, Florida, Rhode Island, North Carolina, Indiana, Wisconsin, Georgia, California, Montana, Maine, West Virginia, New Jersey and the District of Columbia.

The same situation is true of the younger men, particularly in the banks. This reflects more than merely the attraction of the big city for ambitious young men. It is the result of the definite purpose of New York banking to equip itself to perform most effectively its work for all the nation.

A brief description of the mechanism of the nation's banking system will make this clear. Many of the New York banks are bankers' banks. They are great reservoirs of credit in which banks throughout the country deposit unemployed funds in New York. When crop needs in rural districts or industrial expansion in manufacturing centers increase local requirements for money these local banks call in their funds from New York and in addition may ask the big city banks for loans.

Country banks frequently deposit as security the notes of their own customers, often secured, in turn, by farm capital such as ploughs, livestock and other possessions. The fifty thousand dollar note, for instance, of a country bank in a big New York bank may have attached, as collateral security, fifty or a hundred small notes of a hundred dollars up to a thousand or more, signed by local farmers and their wives. Into one of the biggest New York banks comes in this way from the South each crop season a small note secured by a plough and a harrow and a mule named "Molly"—an incident that has been aptly described as "The Minting of Molly." It is one among many securing a large inter-bank credit.

Thus is big banking in New York brought close to the plain people of the soil—thus does it finance their humble husbandry—and thus has it felt the need of recruiting its officers from among men familiar and sympathetic with local conditions—able to visualize the needs of the people there and pass sound judgment on the credit factors involved.

It is due to the conditions thus pictured that among the officers of New York's banks will be found representatives from all parts of the nation. They are the delegates of the people at the business capital.

Why Group Fights Group

America is suffering from a lack of economic understanding. It is, therefore, that we find group arrayed against group—that we find the grower at variance with the producer, the producer with the consumer and both with the carrier. It is because of a lack of economic understanding that we find capital and labor frequently striving against each other. Yet each element is vitally interested in each other for the final succses of the entire endeavor—in the farmer growing a prime crop and getting a fair return; in the canner packing a palatable crop and getting a fair return; in the carrier transporting without damage or deterioration and getting a fair return; in the wholesaler making a wide distribution and getting a fair return; in the retailer satisfying his customer and getting a fair return; in labor aiding each of the processes and getting a fair return; in capital supplying the money and credit to make each process possible and getting a fair return, and in the consumer receiving a pure, nourishing, dependable, wholesome health giving article at a fair price. There is this community of interest in the production and consumption of human requirements that should prohibit strife among the producing and consuming elements.—J. H. Puelicher, President American Bankers Association.

Gompers on Socialism

State socialism is repugnant to the American mind for a great many reasons. Americans generally prefer to carve out the future in freedom. They are unwilling to accept the idea of an all-powerful state. It is the American idea that the people shall order the state and shape its course; not that the state shall order the lives of the people, fitting them into niches to suit a bureaucratic card index.—Samuel Gompers.

SOME HARD FACTS ABOUT SOFT MONEY

By JOHN OAKWOOD

When a farmer takes his product to market and sells it for, say, a dollar a bushel, he is dependent upon the honesty of two measures—the dollar and the bushel.

But meanwhile the politicians start to manipulate the base of the currency. They would change it from the gold standard to a fiat money plan—from a gold guarantee to the mere say-so of the government that a piece of paper was worth a dollar. The farmer wouldn't be watching the money-politicians. He would be too busy raising things. At the end of the year he has his thousand dollars. He takes them to the landowner and says, "I'll buy your land now—here's a thousand dollars."

But the landowner would say, "That is paper money—my land is worth one thousand dollars gold—the government has printed so much paper money folks haven't much confidence in it. But I am willing to take a chance if you will give me a dollar and a quarter in paper money for each gold dollar's value of my land—in other words, I'll give you my land for $1,250 dollars paper."

* * *

Soft money would be only another way for the money-politicians to hand the farmer the same dirty deal as the basket manipulator. In the first case the farmer unknowingly gave a bushel and a quarter of his product, and in the second case he would have to give a dollar and a quarter of his money, for a dollar's value in return.

* * *

In Germany they have carried the manipulation of the mark so far—well, it seems hardly believable, but if they did the same thing to the dollar, it would take over ten million in paper money to buy that land. The primary producer can raise his prices, but not fast enough to equalize this drop in the gold value of unsound money. That is where the catch comes in.

A GOOD WAY TO UPSET PRICES

Further Exposures of How Edison-Ford Money Plan Would Fail to Aid Farmer.

The way the Edison-Ford "commodity money" scheme, aimed to stabilize monetary values, would have exactly the opposite effect, is discussed in the present article, which is the second in a series prepared by the American Bankers Association, reviewing the exposure of the weaknesses of the plan as presented by William T. Foster, Director of the Pollack Foundation for Economic Research.

Briefly stated, the Edison-Ford plan provides for Government warehousing of basic commodities, against which currency would be loaned to the producer without interest, up to half the average value of the products for the previous twenty-five years. This currency would be cancelled as the commodities were withdrawn and passed into trade. On the other half of the value the producer would receive "equity certificates" which he could sell or use for bank loans. On these points Mr. Foster says:

Upsetting Price Equilibrium

"Steady price levels depend mainly on the balance between the volume of goods on the market and the volume of money offered for goods. The Edison plan is designed expressly to upset the balance. A farmer delivers, say, two thousand bushels of wheat to the Goverment warehouse and the Government delivers one thousand dollars in new money to the farmer. When the farmer sells the wheat he repays the loan and the Government destroys the money. Thus the volume of money is increased precisely when goods are stored; and the volume of money is decreased precisely when these goods are marketed. In other words, each transaction begins by placing in circulation goods without money to match the goods. Dollar demand is created as the supply of goods is withdrawn; the supply of goods is created as dollar demand is withdrawn.

"Would it enable the farmer to borrow more money on his products than he can now borrow? When Mr. Edison contends that farmers would obtain larger loans on their crops than they can now obtain from banks, he is confronted by this dilemma: Either the banks are now refusing to make sound loans, or, under the Edison plan, the Government would make unsound loans.

"Neither Mr. Edison nor Mr. Ford can consistently contend that banks now refuse to make sound loans, for that is the way banks make most of their profits, and Mr. Edison and Mr. Ford have no doubt that banks are conducted for profit. It follows that the plan would yield larger loans to farmers only if the Government met the risks of unsound banking. In that case all that insolvent borrowers gained would be paid by the rest of the population, which, to say the least, is not a fair deal.

Cutting Down Farm Credit

"Apparently, however, the Government is not expected to run many risks, for the farmer is allowed to borrow an amount no greater than one-half the average value of his product for the previous twenty-five years. But prices have risen so high since 1896 that the farmer could borrow on most products much less than half the present value of the products. It would be much less, therefore, than the farmer could borrow directly from the banks on graded products; on products not graded no Government loans would be made, for there would be no way of determining the twenty-five-year price average.

"However, the farmer, having obtained the stipulated Government loan on his goods, could then offer his equity certificate to a bank for an additional loan. But the equity certificate is virtually a second mortgage, and no bank would prefer a second mortgage to a first mortgage.

"Suppose the Old National Bank was willing to lend a farmer eight hundred dollars on one thousand bushels of wheat. Suppose, however, the farmer deposited the wheat in a Federal warehouse and obtained five hundred dollars from the Government. Certainly the bank would not lend the farmer three hundred dollars on the equity certificate. The protection of the bank would be greater if the farmer relied on the bank for the entire loan; for in that case the bank could realize on its security without being obliged to pay five hundred dollars to get the wheat out of Government storage. The farmer can now borrow more money from a bank on standardized farm products than under the Edison plan."

GETTING TOGETHER

"The earth and the fullness thereof" is the primary source of capital. The farmer, therefore, is the nation's greatest producer of wealth. Farming and banking—production and distribution—should go hand in hand. The problems of the farmer are the problems of the banker. Both are vitally concerned in bringing about a proper adjustment of transportation and marketing costs. The increasing tendency toward a more sympathetic understanding of each other's relation to these problems is one of the very encouraging signs of the times, and will result in further advancement of their mutual interests.—Walter W. Head, First Vice President American Bankers Association.

A land where the used car problem is practically unknown was the picture of France drawn by Victor Baulin, advertising manager for Andre Citroon, prominent French motor car manufacturer, when the former was visiting at the factory of the Cadillac Motor Car Company last week.

The advertising methords of the French firm have followeed lines similiar to those of American advertisers, full page advertisements of the car having appeard regularly in the newspapers of France.

"In France", said Mr . Baulin, "one keeps the same car indefiintely. Few used cars are on the market, and their prices are but slightly below thosee of new cars. The French man enjoys working over his car, and if any part wears out it is replaced, but seldom is the car disposed of".

CHAPTER VIII

El Capitan.

Stillwell's interest in the revolution ...ross the Mexican line had manifestly ...creased with the news that Gene ...ewart had achieved distinction with ...e rebel forces. Thereafter the old ...ttleman sent for El Paso and Doug-...s newspapers, wrote to ranchmen he ...new on the big bend of the Rio ...rande, and he would talk indefinitely ...o anyone who would listen to him. ...There appeared to be no doubt that the cowboy had performed some daring feats for the rebels. Madeline found his name mentioned in several of the border papers. When the rebels under Madero stormed and captured the city of Juarez, Stewart did fighting that won him the name of El Capitan. This battle apparently ended the revolution. The capitulation of President Diaz followed shortly, and there was a feeling of relief among ranchers on the border from Texas to California. Nothing more was heard of Gene Stewart until April, when a report reached Stillwell that the cowboy had arrived in El Cajon, evidently hunting trouble. The old cattleman saddled a horse and started post-haste for town. In two days he returned, depressed in spirit. Madeline happened to be present when Stillwell talked to Alfred.

"Wal, it's sure amazin' strange about Gene. It's got me locoed. He arrived in El Cajon week or so ago. He was trained down like as if he'd been ridin' the range all winter. He had plenty of money—Mex., they said. An' all the Greasers was crazy about him. Called him El Capitan. He got drunk an' went roarin' round fer Pat Hawe. You remember that Greaser who was plugged last October—the night Miss Majesty arrived? Wal, he's daid, an' people say thet Pat is a-goin' to lay thet killin' onto Gene. I reckon thet's jest talk, though Pat is mean enough to do it, if he hed the nerve. Anyway, if he was in El Cajon he kept mighty much to hisself. Gene walked up an' down, up an' down, all day an' night, lookin' fer Pat. Then Gene met Danny an' tried to get Danny drunk. An' he couldn't! What do you think of that? Danny hedn't been drinkin'—wouldn't touch a drop. I'm sure glad of thet, but it's so amazin' strange. Why, Danny was a fish fer red liquor. I guess he an' Gene had some pretty hard words, though I'm not sure about thet. Anyway, Gene went down to the railroad an' he got on an engine, an' he was in the engine when it pulled out. I jest hed an idee, Miss Majesty. If I can get him, Gene Stewart is the cowboy I want for my foreman. He can manage this bunch of cow-punchers that are drivin' me dotty. What's more, since he's fought fer the rebels an' got that name El Capitan, all the Greasers in the country will kneel to him. Now, Miss Majesty, we hevn't got rid of Don Carlos an' his vaqueros yet. I don't like the looks of things a little bit. I'll tell you now thet Don Carlos knows somethin' about the cattle I lost, an' thet you've been losin' right along. Thet Greaser is hand an' glove with the rebels. I'm willin' to gamble thet when he does get out he an' his vaqueros will make another one of the bands of guerrillas thet are harassin' the border. This revolution ain't over yet. It's jest commenced. An' these gangs of outlaws are goin' to take advantage of it. We'll see some old times, mebbe. Wal, I need Gene Stewart. I need him bad. Will you let me hire him, Miss Majesty, if I can get him straightened up?"

The old cattleman ended huskily.

"Stillwell, by all means find Stewart, and do not wait to straighten him up. Bring him to the ranch," replied Madeline.

Thanking her, Stillwell led his horse away.

Madeline had discovered that a good deal of her sympathy for Stillwell in his hunt for the reckless Stewart had insensibly grown to be sympathy for the cowboy. It was rather a paradox, she thought, that opposed to the continual reports of Stewart's wildness as he caroused from town to town were the continual expressions of good will and faith and hope universally given out by those near her at the ranch. Stillwell loved the cowboy; Florence was fond of him; Alfred liked and admired him, pitied him; the cowboys swore their regard for him the more he disgraced himself. The Mexicans called him El Gran Capitan. Madeline's personal opinion of Stewart had not changed in the least since the night it had been formed. But certain attributes of his, not clearly defined in her mind, and the gift of his beautiful horse, his valor with the fighting rebels, and all this strange regard for him, especially that of her brother, made her exceedingly regret the cowboy's present behavior.

"Gene Walked Up an' Down, Up an' Down, All Day and Night, Lookin' fer Pat."

Meanwhile Stillwell was so earnest and zealous that one not familiar with the situation would have believed he was trying to find and reclaim his own son. He made several trips to little stations in the valley, and from these he returned with a gloomy face. Madeline got the details from Alfred. Stewart was going from bad to worse—drunk, disorderly, savage, sure to land in the penitentiary. Then came a report that hurried Stillwell off to Rodeo. He returned on the third day, a crushed man. He had been so bitterly hurt that no one, not even Madeline, could get out of him what had happened. He admitted finding Stewart, failing to influence him; and when the old cattleman got so far he turned purple in the face and talked to himself, as if dazed: "But Gene was drunk. He was drunk, or he couldn't hev treated old Bill like thet!"

Madeline was stirred with an anger toward the brutal cowboy that was as strong as her sorrow for the loyal old cattleman. And it was when Stillwell gave up that she resolved to take a hand. She yearned to have the faith in human nature that Stillwell had in Stewart.

She sent Nels, mounted upon his own horse, and leading Majesty, to Rodeo in search of Stewart. Nels had instructions to bring Stewart back to the ranch. In due time Nels returned, leading the roan without a rider.

"Yep, I shore found him," replied Nels, when questioned. "Found him half sobered up. He'd been in a scrap, an' somebody hed put him to sleep, I guess. Wal, when he seen thet roan hoss he let out a yell an' grabbed him round the neck. The hoss knowed him, all right. Then Gene hugged the hoss an' cried—cried like—I never seen no one who cried like he did. I waited awhile, an' was jest goin' to say somethin' to him when he turned on me red-eyed, mad as fire. 'Nels,' he said, 'I care a h—l of a lot fer thet hoss, an' I liked you pretty well, but if you don't take him away quick I'll shoot you both.' Wal, I lit out. I didn't even git to say howdy to him."

"Nels, you think it useless—any attempt to see him—persuade him?" asked Madeline.

"I shore do, Miss Hammond," replied Nels, gravely. "I've seen a few sun-blinded an' locoed an' snake-poisoned and skunk-bitten cow-punchers in my day, but Gene Stewart beats 'em all. He's shore runnin' wild fer the divide."

Madeline dismissed Nels, but before he got out of earshot she heard him speak to Stillwell, who awaited him on the porch.

"Bill, put this in your pipe an' smoke it—none of them scraps Gene has hed was over a woman! It used to be thet when he was drunk he'd scrap over every pretty Greaser girl he'd run across. Wal, Gene's scrappin' now is jest to git shot up hisself, for some reason thet only God Almighty knows."

Nels' story of how Stewart wept over his horse influenced Madeline powerfully. Her next move was to persuade Alfred to see if he could not do better with this doggedly bent cowboy. Alfred needed only a word of persuasion, for he said he had considered going to Rodeo of his own accord. He went, and returned alone.

"Majesty, I can't explain Stewart's singular actions," said Alfred. "He has changed terribly. I fancy his once magnificent strength is breaking. It—it actually hurt me to look at him. I couldn't have fetched him back here—not as he is now. Bill did all any man could do for another. We've all done our best for Stewart. If you'd been given a chance perhaps you could have saved him. But it's too late. Put it out of mind now, dear."

Madeline, however, did not forget nor give it up. Days passed, and each one brought additional gossip of Stewart's headlong career toward the Yuma penitentiary. For he had crossed the line into Cochise county, Arizona, where sheriffs kept a stricter observance of law. Finally a letter came from a friend of Nels' in Chiricahua saying that Stewart had been hurt in a brawl there. This epistle inclosed a letter to Stewart from his sister. Evidently, it had been found upon him. It told a story of illness and made an appeal for aid. Nels' friend forwarded this letter without Stewart's knowledge, thinking Stillwell might care to help Stewart's family. Stewart had no money, he said.

The sister's letter found its way to Madeline. She read it, tears in her eyes. It told Madeline much more than its brief story of illness and poverty and wonder why Gene had not written home for so long. It told of motherly love, sisterly love, brotherly love—dear family ties that had not been broken. It spoke of pride in this El Capitan brother who had become famous. It was signed "your loving sister Letty."

Not improbably, Madeline revolved in her mind, this letter was one reason for Stewart's headstrong, long-continued abatement. It had been received too late—after he had squandered the money that would have meant so much to mother and sister. Be that as it might, Madeline immediately sent a bank-draft to Stewart's sister with a letter explaining that the money was drawn in advance on Stewart's salary. This done, she impulsively determined to go to Chiricahua herself.

Nels, when Madeline asked him to accompany her to Chiricahua, replied, reluctantly, that he would rather follow on his horse. However, she prevailed over his hesitancy, and with Florence also in the car they set out. For miles and miles the valley road was smooth, hard-packed, and slightly downhill. And when speeding was perfectly safe, Madeline was not averse to it. And when the car stopped in the wide, dusty street of Chiricahua Nels gladly tumbled out.

"Nels, we shall wait here in the car while you find Stewart," said Madeline.

Nels crossed the railroad track and disappeared behind the low, flat houses. After a little time he reappeared and hurried up to the car.

"Miss Hammond, I found him," said Nels. "He was sleepin'. I woke him. He's sober an' not bad hurt; but I don't believe you ought to see him. Mebbe Florence—"

"Nels, I want to see him myself. Why not? What did he say when you told him I was here?"

"Shore I didn't tell him that. I jest says, 'Hullo, Gene!' an' he says, 'My Gawd! Nels! mebbe I ain't glad to see a human bein'.' He asked me who was with me, an' I told him Link an' some friends. I said I'd fetch them in. He hollered at thet. But I went, anyway. Now, if you really will see him, Miss Hammond, it's a good chance. But shore it's a touchy matter, an' you'll be some sick at sight of him. He's layin' in a Greaser hole over here. Likely the Greasers hev been kind to him. But they're shore a poor lot."

Madeline did not hesitate a moment.

"Thank you, Nels. Take me at once. Come, Florence."

They left the car, now surrounded by gaping-eyed Mexican children, and crossed the dusty space to a narrow lane between red adobe walls. Passing by several houses, Nels stopped at the door of what appeared to be an alleyway leading back. It was filthy.

"He's in there, round thet first corner. It's a patio, open an' sunny. An', Miss Hammond, if you don't mind, I'll wait here for you. I reckon Gene wouldn't like any fellers around when he sees you girls."

"Florence, you wait also," said Madeline, at the doorway, and turned in alone.

And she had stepped into a broken-down patio littered with alfalfa straw and debris, all clear in the sunlight. Upon a bench, back toward her, sat a man looking out through the rents in the broken wall. He had not heard her. Madeline did not recognize Stewart. The side of his face exposed to her was black, bruised, bearded. His clothes were ragged and soiled. There were bits of alfalfa in his hair. His shoulders sagged. He made a wretched and hopeless figure sitting there. Madeline divined something of why Nels shrank from being present.

"Mr. Stewart. It is I, Miss Hammond, come to see you," she said.

He grew suddenly perfectly motionless, as if he had been changed to stone. She repeated her greeting.

His body jerked. He moved violently as if instinctively to turn and face this intruder; but a more violent movement checked him.

Madeline waited. How singular that this ruined cowboy had pride which kept him from showing his face! And was it not shame more than pride?

"Go away," he muttered.

"Mr. Stewart!" she began. "I have come to help you. Will you let me?"

"For God's sake! You—you—" he choked over the words. "Go away!"

"Stewart, perhaps it was for God's sake that I came," said Madeline, gently. "Surely it was for yours—and your sister's—" Madeline bit her tongue, for she had not meant to betray her knowledge of Letty.

He groaned, and, staggering up to the broken wall, he leaned there with his face hidden. Madeline reflected that perhaps the slip of speech had been well.

"Stewart, please let me say what I have to say?"

He was silent. And she gathered courage and inspiration.

"Stillwell is deeply hurt, deeply grieved that he could not turn you back from this—this fatal course. My brother is, also. They wanted to help you. And so do I. I have come, thinking somehow I might succeed where they have failed. Nels brought your sister's letter. I—I read it. I was only the more determined to try to help you, and indirectly help your mother and Letty. Stewart, we want you to come to the ranch. My cowboys are without a capable leader. Will you come?"

"No," he answered.

"But Stillwell wants you so badly."

"No."

"Stewart, I want you to come."

"No."

His replies had been hoarse, loud, furious. All his motions, like his speech, had been violent.

"Will you please go away?" he asked.

"Stewart, certainly I cannot remain here longer if you insist upon my going. But why not listen to me when I want so much to help you? Why?"

"I'm a d—d blackguard," he burst out. "But I was a gentleman once, and I'm not so low that I can stand for you seeing me here."

"When I made up my mind to help you I made it up to see you wherever you were. Stewart, come away, come back with us to the ranch. When you are among friends again you will get well. You will be your old self. The very fact that you were once a gentleman, that you come of good family, makes you owe so much more to yourself. Why, Stewart, think how young you are! It is a shame to waste your life. Come back with me."

"Miss Hammond, this was my last plunge," he replied, despondently. "It's too late."

"At least make an effort, Stewart. Try!"

"No. There's no use. I'm done for. Please leave me—thank you for—"

He had been savage, then sullen, and now he was grim. Madeline all but lost power to resist his strange,

"My Cowboys Are Without a Capable Leader. Will You Come?

deadly, cold finality. No doubt he knew he was doomed. Yet something halted her—held her even as she took a backward step. And she became conscious of a subtle change in her own feeling. She had come into that squalid hole, Madeline Hammond, earnest enough, kind enough in her own intentions; but she had been almost imperious—a woman habitually, proudly used to being obeyed. She divined that all the pride, blue blood, wealth, culture, distinction, all the impersonal condescending persuasion, all the fatuous philanthropy on earth would not avail to turn this man a single hair's-breadth from his downward career to destruction. She was going to fail to help him. She experienced a sensation of impotence that amounted almost to distress. The situation assumed a tragic keenness.

"Stewart, look at me," she asked.

He shuddered. He was abject, crushed. He dared not show his swollen, blackened face. His fierce, cramped posture revealed more than his features might have shown; it betrayed the torturing shame of a man of pride and passion, a man who had been confronted in his degradation by the woman he had dared to enshrine in his heart. It betrayed his love.

"Listen, then," went on Madeline, and her voice was unsteady. "Listen to me, Stewart. You can shake off this desperate mood and be a man."

"No!" he cried.

"Listen to me again. Somehow I know you're worthy of Stillwell's love. Will you come back with us—for his sake?"

"No. It's too late, I tell you."

"Stewart, the best thing in life is faith in human nature. I have faith in you. I believe you are worth it."

"You're only kind and good—saying that. You can't mean it."

"I mean it with all my heart," she replied, a sudden rich warmth suffusing her body as she saw the first sign of his softening. "Will you come back—if not for your own sake or Stillwell's—then for mine?"

"What am I to such a woman as you?"

"A man in trouble, Stewart. But I have come to help you, to show my faith in you."

"If I believed that, I might try," he said.

"Listen," she began, softly, hurriedly. "My word is not lightly given. Let it prove my faith in you. Look at me now and say you will come."

He heaved up his big frame as if trying to cast off a giant's burden, and then slowly he turned toward her. His face was a blotched and terrible thing. The physical brutalizing marks were there, and at that instant all that appeared human to Madeline was the dawning in dead, furnace-like eyes of a beautiful light.

"I'll come," he whispered, huskily. "Give me a few days to straighten up, then I'll come."

"But, Majesty, remember he's a composite of tiger breed and forked lightning!"

SONG OF LEGION AUXILIARY

"The Call of the Flag," Given to Organization by Author, Used in Americanism Campaign.

The patriotic appeal of the song, "The Call of the Flag," is to become one of the factors of the Americanism campaign which is being waged by the American Legion Auxiliary. This song, which has been adopted by the Auxiliary as its official composition, has a stirring air and possesses words which create a high enthusiasm among the hearers. The song was first heard by Legionnaires and Auxiliary members at the New Orleans convention, where it received the official endorsement of the Auxiliary.

Mrs. Madge King Johnston, national vice-president and chairman of the Americanism committee of the Auxiliary, plans to make wide use of the official song in the work which is being undertaken by the Auxiliary along the lines of Americanism. The song is now being distributed by the national organization of the Auxiliary through its departments and local units. Recent popularization of the song has been assisted by broadcasting from various radio stations throughout the country, particularly on one patriotic holiday, when it was made a part of a special program.

Other ways of putting the composition before the public are being urged by Mrs. Johnston and through her efforts and those of other members of the committee, local units of the Auxiliary have received the endorsement of many civic, patriotic and fraternal organizations throughout the nation for the new song.

Mrs. L. D. Westfelt of New Orleans, who composed the song, turned over the plates, rights and arrangements for publication of future editions to the women of the Auxiliary. She advanced considerable money for the initial work, but freely gave this. Word has just been received by Mrs. Johnston from New Orleans telling of Mrs. Westfelt's death shortly after landing from a trip to Egypt and the Mediterranean sea.

A letter received by Mrs. Johnston told of her pleasure at returning home, and of her intense interest in the progress of the song. Mrs. Johnston, in a message to national headquarters of the Auxiliary says: "We will now feel that our work is a sacred obligation bequeathed to us in fulfilling her desires to aid the boys in this way."

The song may be obtained in sheet music form, orchestrations, band arrangements and on player piano rolls. All rights to the composition have been relinquished by the composer to the Auxiliary.

FORD HOSPITAL DOORS OPEN

Detroit Institution to Admit Disabled War Veterans Who Are In Need of Attention.

A personal plea from Alvin Owsley, national commander of the American Legion, to Henry Ford has resulted in hospitalization for 300 disabled war veterans of Michigan.

Ford has agreed to throw open the doors of his big hospital in Detroit to every disabled ex-service man and woman in the state, following Commander Owsley's statement of the hopeless fight the Michigan veterans were making because the government failed to simplify the formal procedure through which applicants for hospitalization are forced to go and which has resulted in long delay in obtaining relief for the war fighters.

After hearing the Legion head's appeal, Mr. Ford immediately instructed the superintendent of the Henry Ford hospital to receive at once any man in need of hospital treatment who could produce proof of war service. The Ford hospital covers 20 acres in the heart of Detroit. It was used as United States general hospital No. 36 during and after the war.

Form Units of "Polar Bears."

Members of the detachment of American troops which served in Russia during the World war are forming units of the "Polar Bears." These men include a number of prominent Legionnaires who were on duty in the frozen north while their comrades were in France. They find much to talk about, according to reports of their meetings. Hard tack at $10, cigarettes at $2.50 a package, nights in "pup" tents with the thermometer flirting around 50 below—these are among the topics of the former members of the A. E. F. in Russia. Units of the organization have been formed in Chicago and in Detroit.

When it comes to haying and harvesing machinery there are two factors very important. First, you want to choose a machine with a reputation such as, Dain Loaders, Keystone Loaders, McCormick mowers, and McCormick side-delivery rakes. And secondly, get machinery with repair service as is given by the John Deere and International Harvestor Co. In haying time and harvest you do not want to wait weeks for repairs. Get Standard Machinery!

ONE OF COUNTY'S OLDEST CITIZENS DIED LAST WEEK

MR. CHRISTIAN SCHAEFER

By Rev. A. W. Grauger

It becomes our duty to chronicle the passing of another of our old and esteemed residents. This time it happens to be one of the very oldest, for Grandpa Schaefer lived to be nearly a centurian.

Up to quite recently he had been in fair health for one of his age. Especially was he alert mentally to a remarkable degree. He lived to the age of ninety-five years, ten months and eleven days. when called to his reward on the evening of June 11, 1923.

Christian Schaefer was born in Kernbeck, Hessian Germany Aug.19, 1828. There he grew up to manhood and obtained his education which fitted him for life. However he continuid to read and study in after life to qualify himself for a reel life work. This is especially true along religious lines.

In 1846 Mr. Schaefer came to America locating for the time being at St. Louis, Mo. In 1850 he moved to Watertown Wis Where he made his permanent home for some years, engaging in farming.

During this time he became greatly interested in religious work and felt called to preach the gospel. The Methodist Episcopal Church licensed him to the order of a local-Preacher and theereupon sent him out into the pioneer districts of Wisconsin to preach and evangelize the unchurch ed. Gleaning from his account of the work thus done, he worked with a remarkable degree of success, organizing societies and building churches. He was a man with the unabated zeal of Paul to preach and to do the work of a missionary.While the deceased was never an ordained minister, he had three brothers who were ordained Methodist ministers, who likewise possessed a similar missionary zeal.

Mr. Schaefer was united in marriage in 1853 to Miss Marie Schneider. Their married life was a happy one this bond being broken when the companion preceded in death in May 5, 1912.

Five sons and five daughters were born to them. All but one son and one daughter survive the parents.

In 1893 the diseased and amily removed to Iowa and located on a farm in Liberty township. There they resided until about twenty years ago when they came to Garner to live. building a comfortable home which they enjoyed while they both lived.

During the last years Grandpa Schaefer made his home with his daughter, Mrs. J. A. Schuler where he received the most devoted care. His one great desire during the time while was to depart and to be with Christ. He often quoted the words of Paul: "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.

Funeral services were held Wed. 9:30 at the Grace M. E. Church by Rev. Gaugtr.

KLAN WANTS SPACE IN PARADE

people to Esterville. Most people have written Secretary Biedermann to reserve a section in the big parade at the homecoming for them. This will probably be a big drawing card and will bring thousands of people to Esterville. Most people know there are any members of that klan at Esterville, but they have been very free in writing letters to various Esterville individuals and as they show themselves at the Home meeting we can no longer doubt their presence there ,Here is the letter they sent Sec. Biedermann:—

"We wish to have a space in the coming parade reserved for us. We want it as near the middle as pos sible & will need one block of space as we will be mounted and in cars in full regalia. If we are not allowed a place peacefully we will take it by force. Please answer through papers.

THE FLIVVER JOKE PAYS

The Flivver Joke is 20 Years Old But Henry Only Gets $50,000,000 Out of It Every Year

Detroit, June20.—The flivver joke is 20 years old today. And Henry is getting $50,000,000 worth of laughs out of it every twelve months.

Twenty years ago the dream of Henry Ford, mechanic—he wasn't even an automobile engineer—began to come true.

The Ford factories are now celebrating the conclusion of the second decade of their existance.

Their dominating head is celebrating the fact that they have made him the richest man in the world a national figure.

The Ford Company today is at the zeneth of its prosperity. and is carrying out an expansion program of enormous magnitude.

Twenty yars ago on this date the first Ford unit went into operation.

The company back of it was incorporated at only $100,000 of which it had been possible to raise but $28,000 in actual working capital.

There were but twelve stockholders including the originator and inventor.

Today the company has built up a business with an actual turnover of over $500,000,000.

Henry Ford originally owned but 25 per cent of the stock. He had to sacrifice the remainder to the urgent need for cash capital.

But in 1907 he bought in enough of the outstanding stock to bring his holdings to 58½ per cent.

In 1908 the model "T" Ford was first put on the market.

After its success was firmly established Mr. Ford began to put his own ideas as to the relationship between capital and labor into effect.

In 1913 he established a minimum wage scale of $5 a day for all employes and with this went his profit sharing plan.

Those measures turned both automobile and other industries upside down for a time. It was originally predicted that the scheme would not work.

Yet a year later he announced that if sales passed the necessary mark every purchaser of a "tin lizzie" would receive a rebate.

The sales passed the necessary mark and checks went out to hundreds of thousands of happy purchasers.

In 1919 Edsel Ford became president of the concern and purchased the remainder of the stock. It is all controlled now by the former mechanic, whose schemes were deemed impossible, and his son. In that same year the company was reorganized under the Delaware laws with a capital of $100,000,000

Beginning with 1,708 cars a year in 1903 the output has grown until now the company turns out 1,500,000 cars and trucks a year.

The current year will probably see this figure exceeded. This will equal the production of all other makers in this country combined. More than 6,000.000 flivvers are now in use. More than 7,800,000 have been manufactured.

Ford's employes now number more more than 100,000. The pay roll started with less than 20 names. The Highland Park plant here covers 300 acres and the River Rouge plant covers 1,200 acres and has the largest foundry in the world.

After continued battle for materials Ford determined on a self supporting policy.

The company now owns thousands of acres of coal fields, a railroad to tap them, forests, blast furnaces, machine shops, body plant, saw mills, coke ovens. a cement mill a paper plant, a plate glass factory and a locomotive shop.

The company's branches now number thirty-four. There are 9,000 authorizedd Ford dealers and 15,000 Ford service stations. There are several foreign branches.

Few industries have ever paid such a large rate on original investment. Few have paid such a tremendous sum in salaries and few have given such opportunities for workmen to secure advancement or to work year in and year out with practically no lay-offs.

Henry, who will be 60 years old on July 30, is still on the job eighteen hours a day planning even greater things. He can do more than plan for he has more than $200 000,000 in cash in the banks of the United States.

The Ford factories now are turning out approximately 6,800 cars a day under a system of factory management an efficiency which has been the despair of imitators. His competitors estimate his profits at $50 a car.

The flivver is an old joke but a good one—for Henry.

PULL TOGETHER

Two fool Jackasses—Say! get this dope,
Were tied together with a piece of rope;
Said one to the other, "You come my way,"
While I take a nibble at the new mown hay.

"I won't," said the other, "You come with me,
For I, too, have some hay, you see."
So they got nowhere just pawed up dirt,
And, Oh, by Golly, that rope did hurt.

Then they faced about, these stubborn mules
And said, "We're just like human fools;
Let's pull together: "I'll go your way,
Then come with me and we'll both eat hay.'

Well,they ate their hay and liked it, too,
And swore to be comrades good and true;
As the sun went down they were heard to bray:
"Ah! this is the end of a perfect day."

Now get this lesson, don't let it pass,
All men can copy from the poor Jackass,
By pulling together, 'tis the only way
To put yourself on the mp to stay.

TWO TRACTS OF LAND IN IOWA ONCE OWNED BY LINCOLN

ABRAHAM LINCOLN ONCE HELD LAND IN IOWA

In order to keep history straight J. B. McHose, of Boone has been tracing the land in Iowa once held by Abraham Lincoln. One tract is located in Crawford county and the other in Tama county. Carl K. Kuenhnle, banker, of Dennison, supplied some data to Mr. McHose on the land in Crawford county.It consists of 120 acres six and a half miles northwest of Dennison, and deeded by Robert Lincoln, while he was ambassador to England. March 22,1892. to Henry Edwards. C. L. Voss in turn acquired it under contract which was then assigned to Henry Edwards, who then deeded ie to Peter F. Jepson. At last accaunts Mr. Jepson owned the land.

Charles Berry, of Toledo, is now the owner of tht Lincoln land in Tama county eight miles northwest of Tama in Howard Township. It was deeded in 1847 by Robert T. Lincoln to Adam Brecht, and Mr. Brecht's heirs are still the owners.

SCHOOL BUYS MORE LAND

The board of education seeing in the not very far distant future tht need another set of school buildings to house Belmond's sonstantly growing enrollment, has completed a deal in which four lots just across thee street directly west of the school are purchased. The council, at a special meeting Monday night, condemned and closed the street which lies between the lots and the school house, so that the addition will make a fine extension to the grounds —Herald- Press.

NEWS OF INTEREST AND VALUE TO THE FARMER

POTATO HOPPER SERIOUS PEST

Late Seeding Gives Insect Chance To Before Tubers Get Started Started

The potato leafhopper has a lead on the spud in the race between the two enemies this year, because of the fact that potatoes were planted late, says F. A. Fenton, specialist in entomology at Iowa State College.

For this reason careful spraying for the hopper is more important than usual. These insects, which are present on the potato vines evry year, are the small green insects which appear early in June. About two weeks later the young begin to hatch and in another week the first signs of hooperburn show up on the older and lower leaves.

This year the first brood of hoppors will produce hooperburn before the tuber formation has begun and will cause serious damage unless the plants are protected with bordeaux mixture spray.

To prepare five gallons of bordeaux, one-half pound of blue vitrol or copper sulfate is dissolved in about five gallons of water and the milk of lime from one-half pound of saked lime is added to the blue vitrol solution.

If potato beetles are also at work on the plants, a heaping tablespoonfulof Paris green added to the Bordeaux mixture will control them.

"Many proprietary brands of dry bordeaux mixture powders are now on the market." says Dr. Fenton, "and these are effective if used at label strength. Because leafhoppers feed on th under sides of the leaves it is necessary to spray the vines both from above and below."

MOW THISTLES EVERY 2 WEEKS

Salt and Sheep Help to Eradicate Weed

Cutting Thistles every two weeks is a successful method of eradicating this worst of all common weed pests, says the farm crops department of the Iowa State College. The application of a handful of salt to the surface around each plant helps, especially, if sheep are available. The sheep, according to the farm crops men, will gnaw at the roots to get the salt. They "earn their salt" by destroying the roots of thistles.

DIARY TYPE IMPORTANT

Weaver Sees No Need for Producion Records on Ring Animals

That production records for the admission of diary animals to competion in the show ring—a proposal that is being widely discussed—is not a desireable requirement is the opinion of Earl Weaver, head of the diary husbandry department of Iowa State College.

"The chief function of the diary cow" says Mr. Weaver, "is the production of milk and fat, but the race as a whole would have progressed. to its present status if breeders had not recognized the importance of proper type in increasing production.

"This old controversy as to the relation between form and function in diary cattle is unfortunate and as long as it persists diary cattle improvement will be retarded. Form and function go together".

Mr. Weaver believes that proposed rules are not needed, that no set of rules so far suggested is feasible and that such rules are undesireable.

"Show ring type," he asserts, "and production type are the same thing. Agitation against 'fancy' is relic of past ages. We do not now find judges placing animals on fancy points."

Fat production, says Mr. Weaver. is not the only measure of a cow's worth. What she can do in improvement thru better calves in an important and better typed cows have better calves and make greater contribution to the breed.

Some Facts About T. B. Law

The new law passed last winter is simply an addition to what we have had for the past four years. The law with its changes provides:

That you may have your herd tested free of charge by a government, state or county veterinarian, provided you sign the agreement.

Whenever a petition is signed by fifty-one percent of the owners of cattle, within the county, and presented to the board of supervisors they shall apply to the state secretary of agriculture for a county area test.

The board of supervisors may then make a levy of not more than three mills for raising funds to be used in conjunction with state and federal money, otherwise appropriated by the state and federal government, in paying for salary and expenses of tuberculosis inspectors and for paying the indemnity for reactor cattle.

When seventy-five per cent of the cattle owners shall have signed the agreement to test their cattle, the remaining twenty-five per cent can be requested to test. Failure to comply with this request subjects the owner to fine or inprisonment.

Any owner of cattle whose loss shall be less than five per cent of the total appraised, value of the animals tested, shall, in consideration of the free test, waive all claims for indemnity.

Where the loss is greater than five per cent of the total appraisal, indemnity ill be paid on the amount over and above the five per cent to the extent of two-thirds of the apparent loss, the apparent loss meaning the difference between the salvage value and appraised value. If, for evample, your herd appraisal is $1000. and you lose one $50 animal, you will get no indemnity.

You will, however be reimbursed to the extent of two-thirds of the loss over and above $50.

The government will pay a maximum of $25 for grades and $50 for purebreds as their one third share. The state will pay the same amount.

TO SPRAY INFECTED TREES FROM AERIAL DEVICES

WASHINGTON, June 21. —The Agricultural department is about to conduct a novel experiment in fighting the gypsy moth in New England. An equipment has been devised that can be attached to a baloon so that poison spray can be applied in forest areas from the air. It is believed this method of spraying from the air will be far more effective than attempting a liquid spray from the ground primarily because it will be easier to reach the infected parts of trees. From tests already made it is known that from the standpoint of economy the areal spray is cheaper than the system now in use. If the experments of the department in New England area prove successful, the system will probably be used in treatment of all forest areas infested with leafeating insects.

Ringsted Dispatch:— The new Minnesota Dance law goes into effect June 1st. It makes it mandatory for anyone holding a public dance to secure a permit before holding the dance. Permits are issued by town and township officials. It makes a stiff penality for bringing booze into the vicinity of a dance hall bars bootleggers and prostitutes, leaves Sunday dances up to the decision of the town and township boards, prohibits those under sixteen from being present unless accompanied by parents or gaurdians, those 16 to 18 must also be accompanied by parents or guardian or have written consent of same. The law also makes it necessary for an officer of the law to be present at all dances All boards can revoke their permit for cause and any five residents of the locallity of the dance can likewise petition the closing of the dance hall for cause. The law also places restictions as to the methods of dancing.

6,000 KILLED IN PERSIA QUAKE

Five Prosperous Villages Hurled Off Mountainside and Buried.

MESSINA ON SMALLER SCALE

Persian Embassy at Moscow in Appeal for Aid Declares Death Roll Probably Will Exceed Twenty Thousand.

Moscow, June 16.—Thousands have perished in repeated earthquake shocks in the mountainous district of northwest Persia, according to information received by the Persian embassy here. The dead are already known to exceed 6,000, and many thousands more were injured. The whole population is flying in panic to open country further south, destitute and homeless.

Details received show a picture like that of Messina on a small scale. Five prosperous villages were perched on the hillside overlooking a fertile valley north of the town of Torbat. Shortly after midnight, while the population was sleeping in rough cottages of unmortared stones, the first shock suddenly brought roofs down on their heads.

The second shock, severer than the first, hurled the whole plateau, on which the village rested, off the mountainside down with an appalling crash.

Of 3,000 persons peacefully sleeping ten minutes before, not one survived, and their remains are buried under millions of tons of rocks.

The town of Torbat, almost entirely of one-story buildings, on the plain, suffered less, but here, too, the casualties numbered 1,000 killed and hundreds injured.

The Persian embassy has issued an appeal for relief funds. The charge d'affaires says the area of the disaster is fully 1,000 square miles and the population affected not less than a quarter of a million. The death roll probably will exceed 20,000.

Smugglers of Chinese and Booze Try to Rob Sloop's Passengers.

YELLOW MEN ARE VICTORS

Drift Into New York Port With a Lurid Tale of Battle—Five Chinese, Two Whites and Two Negroes Slain.

New York, June 15.—A strange story of a fight on the high seas, in which five Chinese, two white men and two negroes were slain aboard the sloop Mary Beatrice, was told here by one of the surviving Chinese.

The Mary Beatrice, a two-masted British "Bahama sponger," was found off New York bay without crew or captain and with fifteen Chinamen aboard.

One of them made a statement to immigration authorities, asserting that after he and his fellow orientals had paid $500 apiece to be smuggled into the United States from Cuba, the skipper absconded with the money, the crew tried to hold up the Chinamen, and in the ensuing battle the Chinese, whites and negroes died.

Through an interpreter, the Chinaman told how he and companions, embarking at Havana May 8, were packed aboard with the skipper, two white sailors, and two blacks. Conditions were terrible. In addition to the Chinamen, the skipper had a cargo of whisky.

June 6, after a slow voyage, the Mary Beatrice—by this time a veritable "hell ship"—arrived off New York bay. The skipper cruised up and down waiting for smuggling launches to come out and remove his shipment of "booze and Chinks."

Last Tuesday, the narrator said, the captain announced that he was going to depart. Food and water had run low. Before leaving he distributed rifles and pistols to his crew—the two whites and two blacks.

After the skipper had rowed away in the only small boat—and had taken with him all the passage money—the crew decided to hold up the passengers.

The Chinese refused to give up their money. Most of them were unarmed, but they scurried around and grabbed what weapons they could in the shape of hatchets and knives from the galley.

The two whites and the two negroes, being drunk, were banging away with rifles and revolvers without doing much damage. In a few minutes their ammunition was exhausted and the Chinese emerged from their hiding places and in a hand-to-hand fight massacred the crew.

The bodies were pitched overboard and the fifteen survivors cleaned up the ship, set distress signals, and sat down to wait for something to happen. They are being held for deportation.

Crowder Evidently Quite Busy in C

Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, whose name is a household word in America, has evidently been doing good work in Cuba as United States ambassador. Within the past twelve months the Cuban government by following his recommendations has been able to effect a remarkable improvement in national finances. This has made enemies for him among those who have lost their easy jobs.

All of which presumably accounts for reports from Cuba that Ambassador Crowder was about to resign and go home. However, the State department has formally denied the reports.

"Ambassador Crowder enjoys the fullest confidence of President Harding and of the State department," it was stated. "There is no foundation whatever for reports that he will either resign or be withdrawn."

After his draft duties were over General Crowder went to Cuba, at her request and with the permission of his government, to supervise the re of her suffrage laws, a very important duty, because suffrage is the fou of most of the Latin-American political troubles. When this job was d was assigned to Cuba as the special representative of President Hardi he knows Cuba from sugar to graft.

General Crowder is a rather under-sized man, perfectly straight. H swear proficiently in English, Spanish, French, Italian and Tagalog.

Uncle Sam Wins Diplomatic Triu

Eliot Wadsworth, assistant tary of the treasury, appears t won a clean-cut diplomatic vict the United States. Anyway, re tatives of the United States, F Great Britain, Italy and Belgiu signed an agreement on the Am army of occupation costs, amou $250,000,000 at Paris. The States wins every article whi been the object of contention last three months, gains a con on priority, and succeeds in su ing the objectionable codicil on by the British and French denied America's right to collect claims.

Eliot Wadsworth, for the States, Sir John Bradbury, fo land, M. Tannery, for Franc Damelio, for Italy, and M. Ben for Belgium, are the signatures document. Except Mr. Wadswo are members of the reparation mission. The Baldwin government is credited with the allies' yielding understood that former Prime Minister Bonar Law previously had opp settlement of this debt through the reparations commission while the were settled outside of the commission. Prime Minister Baldwin shar opinion, according to British sources, but he believed the United States ship more important than to win the diplomatic dispute.

Of course there are those who hold that the United States, in securi settlement, is definitely drawn into the reparations tangle. But public seems well satisfied with the agreement for the payment of the bill.

Baldwin, Britain's New Prime Mini

There is a new government in Great Britain and Andrew Bonar Law has been succeeded as prime minister by Stanley Baldwin. It is a surprising development, which indicates, among other things, Mr. Baldwin's personal popularity, as the cheerful, good-humored and straightforward business man who negotiated at Washington the funding of the British debt to America.

Three facts stand out in the selection: The capture of the premiership by a business man. Another blow to the prestige of the house of lords in the rejection of Earl Curzon. The growing power of labor as shown by the part it played in the decision.

In steel, shipping, banking and railroads Baldwin has had lifelong experience. He is brisk, alert, up-to-date. During the war, when he could not himself fight, he surrendered one-fourth of his large fortune to the state.

While his father, Alfred Baldwin, was in steel, the women of the family have been literary and artistic. litical and literary annals there have been many famous sisterhoods, have been more interesting than the four daughters of Rev. George donald, Wesleyan Methodist minister, of whom Georgiana married ward Burne-Jones and appeared as the type of saintly loveliness in tures; Agnes married Sir Edward Poynter, president of the Royal a Alice married an Indian official called Rudyard Kipling, and Louisa Alfred Baldwin and still lives as the prime minister's mother.

OUGHT FREEDOM FOR ALL

Lafayette's Aim Was Establishment of Government by the People Throughout the World.

Gilbert Du Motier, Marquis De La fayette, was a man who did good things in the world. In France he worked for human justice and democracy and was one of the leaders in the overthrow of the wicked monarchic system of priveledges and in the establishment of government by the people. In America he fought for the end he presuaded France to send the men and ships that made possible the final victory of Yorktown.

France reveres the memory of Lafayette. Born a nobleman, he was ever a nobleman, a man whose motives were unselfish and whose life was devoted to the betterment of the lives of others. America reveres the memory of Lafayette because in America his unselfishness was most nobly exemplyfied. Not for the freedom of France alone but for the freedom of all the enslaved peoples of the world was Lafayette ever read y to fight or to die.

HISTORIC WORDS NOT ADAMS'

Quotation Familiar to Every Schoolboy is From a Speech Delivered by Daniel Webster

"Sink or Swim, live or die, survive r perish, I give my heart and hand with this vote. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it hall be my dying sentiments in dependence now and independence forever."

How often have these lines been declaimed on the school forum by the piping adolscent! But how often has the speaker known just under what circumstances they were written?

It is suposed to be a quotation from a speech delivered by John Adams at the session of Continental congress in 1776. It was however included in a speech by Daniel Webster, delivered by him in Faneuil hall, and written the previous day in Boston. It was composed by Webster as embodying an impressive form of argument relied upon by friends and opponents of the Declaration of Independence and was framed about various sentiments expressed by Adams at different times.

WHAT ADVERTISING HAS DONE

Advertising has made the Victrola dog famous. It has made the cash register a big brothrer to retailers all the world over.

It has displaced the truck horse with 40 horse power trucks.

It has helped you to an appreciation of Stetson hats, Walk-over, Peters, and Florsheim shoes.

It has made the hand written letter an oddity in business.

It has put hair oil on heads where no hair oil would do any good, and on heads where no hair oil was needed.

It has put Castoria down your throat, left bristles in your gums, and then came along with a rubber set and took them out.

It has put Sozodent, Pebecca and Pepsodent on your teeth. Advertising has put the Gillette against your hayfield.

It has put Murine in your eye, sold you Cuticura for pimples, pears for the bath and Ivory for the tub.

It has put Arrow collars around your neck and Ingersoles around your wrist.

It has jammed your feet in Holeproof sox, put Paris garters on your legs. Tiffany rings on your fingers.

It has stuck Robert Burns cigars between your teeth, worn out your jaws on Wrigley's and posted you on what to buy to cure corn's, warts, bunions and ingrown toenails.

Go anywhere you want, and advertising has had a hand in it—absolutely. And then some people ask "DOES ADVERTISING PAY?"

Looks are often deceiving. No auto is over 26 years old.

COPELAND'S ADVICE

One Slice of Bread a Meal

By Royal S. Copeland, M. D.

Here's a problem in health and happiness. In normal times the United States ships abroad a tremendous amount of wheat Our exports are about 170,000,000 bushels Poverty and currency depreciation makes in impossible for Europe to buy our products.

What is to became of the surplus grain? This is a serious problem and it must be solved. Otherwise agriculture the foundation of American prosperity, will suffer untold damage.

A few days ago a great expert told me the whole problem would disappear if everybody would eat an extra slice of bread every meal. To do this would require an extra annual supply of 170,000,000 bushels of wheat.

My first thought was this:

If we eat more bread we will eat less meat, and other farm products therefore , we would help the farmer one way and damage him another.

But the expert had a very convincing answer. If the surplus wheat were converted into flour and then baked into bread, the process would require great quantities of other products.

For instance, to make the necessary yeast to prepare this vast mountain of bread would require 1,500,000 bushels of corn, as well as vast quantities of rye barley. An equal quantity of corn would be needed to fatten the 4,000,000 hogs from which the lard would come.

To bake the surplus wheat into bread would require an ocean of milk.

A billion pounds of butter would be called for to spread on the bread.

Sugar, jams. cheese and sauces would be demanded as "spreads".

Think what a lot of good would be done the farmers of America if we were to help them by consuming the wheat normally sent abroad.

We would be doing ourselves a lot of good also. There is no better food than bread when made of the whole grain and not from denatured and devitalized flour.

The national health would be benefited and each of us would add to the expectation of life. This plan to eat the surplus is well worth while. Let us go ahead with it.

The second battalion of the third U. S. Infantry is marching through from Fort Snelling, Minn., to Fort Des Moines. They are expected to reach Garner Friday, June 22nd., where they will pitch camp for the night and will make camp at Belmond the following night. There will be about 300 men, 11 officers about 75 horses and mules and some supply wagons and equipment. If they camp at Garner Friday night we can look for them here early forenoon, but whether will come into town we do not They will probably march on the highway without to Klemme.

DON CARLOS

SYNOPSIS.—Arriving at the lonely little railroad station of El Cajon, New Mexico, Madeline Hammond, New York society girl, finds no one to meet her. While in the waiting room, a drunken cowboy enters, asks if she is married, and departs, leaving her terrified. He returns with a priest, who goes through some sort of ceremony, and the cowboy forces her to say "Si." Asking her name and learning her identity the cowboy seems dazed. In a shooting scrape outside the room a Mexican is killed. The cowboy lets a girl, Bonita, take his horse and escape, then conducts Madeline to Florence Kingsley, friend of her brother. Florence welcomes her, learns her story, and dismisses the cowboy, Gene Stewart. Next day Alfred Hammond, Madeline's brother, takes Stewart to task. Madeline exonerates him of any wrong intent. Alfred, scion of a wealthy family, had been dismissed from his home because of his dissipation. Madeline sees that the West has redeemed him. She meets Stillwell, Al's employer, typical western ranchman. Stillwell tells her how Stewart beat up the sheriff to save her from arrest and then lit out for the border. Danny Mains, one of Stillwell's cowboys, has disappeared, with some of Stillwell's money. His friends link his name with the girl Bonita. Madeline gets a glimpse of life on a western ranch. Stewart sends Madeline his horse Majesty. She buys out Stillwell and "Her Majesty's Rancho" becomes famous. She finds her life work under "The Light of Western Stars." Learning Stewart had been hurt in a brawl at Chiricahua. Madeline visits him and persuades him to come to the ranch as the boss of her cowboys. Jim Nels, Nick Steele, and "Monty" Price are Madeline's chief riders. They have a feud with Don Carlos' vaqueros, who are really guarrillas.

CHAPTER IX

The New Foreman.

Toward the end of the week Stillwell informed Madeline that Stewart had arrived at the ranch and had taken up quarters with Nels.

"Gene's sick. He looks bad," said the old cattleman. "He's so weak an' shaky he can't lift a cup. Nels says that Gene has hed some bad spells. A little liquor would straighten him up now. But Nels can't force him to drink a drop, an' has hed to sneak some liquor in his coffee. Gene's losin' his mind, or he's got somethin' powerful strange on it."

Stewart was really ill. It became necessary to send for a physician. Then Stewart began slowly to mend and presently was able to get up and about. Stillwell said the cowboy lacked interest and seemed to be a broken man. This statement, however, the old cattleman modified as Stewart continued to improve. Then presently it was a good augury of Stewart's progress that the cowboys once more took up the teasing relation which had been characteristic of them before his illness.

"Wal, the boys are sure after Gene," said Stillwell, with his huge smile. "Joshin' him all the time about how he sits around an' hangs around an' waits around jest to get a glimpse of you, Miss Majesty. Sure all the boys have a pretty bad case over their pretty boss, but none of them is a marker to Gene. He's got it so bad, Miss Majesty, thet he actooly don't know they're joshin' him. It's the amazin'est strange thing I ever seen."

Madeline smiled her amusement. It had been impossible for her to fail to observe Stewart's singular behavior. She never went out to take her customary walks and rides without seeing him somewhere in the distance. She was aware that he watched for her and avoided meeting her. When she sat on the porch during the afternoon or at sunset Stewart could always be descried at some point near. He idled listlessly in the sun, lounged on the porch of his bunkhouse, sat whittling the top bar of the corral fence, and always it seemed to Madeline he was watching her. He was pale, haggard, drawn. His eyes held a shadow through which shone a soft, subdued light; and, once having observed this, Madeline fancied it was like the light in Majesty's eyes, in the dumb, worshipping eyes of her favorite stag-hound. She told Stewart that she hoped he would soon be in the saddle again, and passed on her way.

That Stewart loved her Madeline could not help but see. When she discovered this she felt a little surprise and annoyance. Then she interrogated herself, and concluded that it was not that Stewart was so different from his comrades, but that circumstances made him stand out from them. She recalled her meeting with him that night when he had tried to force her to marry him. This was unforgettable in itself. She recalled subsequent mention of him, and found it had been peculiarly memorable. The man and his actions seemed to hinge on events. Lastly, the fact standing clear of all others in its relation to her interest was that he had almost been ruined, almost lost, and she had saved him. That alone was sufficient to explain why she thought of him differently. She had befriended, uplifted the other cowboys; she had saved Stewart's life. To be sure, he had been a ruffian, but a woman could not save the life of even a ruffian without remembering it with gladness. Madeline at length decided her interest in Stewart was natural, and that her deeper feeling was pity. Perhaps the interest had been forced from her; however, she gave the pity as she gave everything.

Stewart had taken up his duties as foreman, and his activities were ceaseless. He was absent most of the time, ranging down toward the Mexican line. When he returned Stillwell sent for him.

This was late in the afternoon of a day in the middle of April. Alfred and Florence were with Madeline on the porch.

Madeline saw the man she remembered, but with a singularly different aspect. His skin was brown; his eyes were piercing and dark and steady; he carried himself erect; he seemed preoccupied, and there was not a trace of embarrassment in his manner.

"You Don't Mean You Follered Them Hoss Tracks Thet Far?

"Wal, Gene, I'm sure glad to see you," Stillwell was saying. "Where do you hail from?"

"Guadalupe canyon," replied the cowboy.

Stillwell whistled.

"'Way down there! You don't mean you follered them hoss tracks thet far?"

"All the way from Don Carlos' rancho across the Mexican line. I took Nick Steele with me. Nick is the best tracker in the outfit. This trail we were on led along the foothill valleys. First we thought whoever made it was hunting for water. But they passed two ranches without watering. At Seaton's wash they dug for water. Here they met a pack-train of burros that came down the mountain trail. The burros were heavily loaded. Horse and burro tracks struck south from Seaton's to the old California emigrant road. We followed the trail through Guadalupe canyon and across the border. On the way back we stopped at Slaughter's ranch, where the United States cavalry are camping. There we met foresters from the Peloncillo forest reserve. If these fellows knew anything they kept it to themselves. So we hit the trail home."

"Wal, I reckon you know enough?" inquired Stillwell, slowly. "Miss Hammond can't be kept in the dark much longer. Make your report to her."

The cowboy shifted his dark gaze to Madeline. "We're losing a few cattle on the open range. Night-drives by vaqueros. Some of these cattle are driven across the valley, others up into the foothills. So far as I can find out no cattle are being driven south. So this raiding is a blind to fool the cowboys. Don Carlos is a Mexican rebel. He located his rancho here a few years ago and pretended to raise cattle. All that time he has been smuggling arms and ammunition across the border. He was for Madero against Diaz. Now he is against Madero because he and all the rebels think Madero failed to keep his promises. There will be another revolution. And all the arms go from the States across the border. Those burros I told about were packed with contraband goods."

"What is my—my duty? What has it to do with me?" inquired Madeline, somewhat perturbed.

"Wal, Miss Majesty, I reckon it hasn't nothing to do with you," put in Stillwell. "Thet's my bizness an' Stewart's. But I jest wanted you to know. There might be some trouble follerin' my orders."

"Your orders?"

"I want to send Stewart over to fire Don Carlos an' his vaqueros off the range. They've got to go. Don Carlos is breakin' the law of the United States, an' doin' it on our property an' with our hosses. Hev I your permission, Miss Hammond?"

"Why, assuredly you have! Stillwell, you know what to do. Alfred, what do you think best?"

"It'll make trouble, Majesty, but it's got to be done," replied Alfred. "Here you have a crowd of eastern friends due next month. We want the range to ourselves then. But, Stillwell, if you drive those vaqueros off, won't they hang around in the foothills? I declare they are a bad lot."

"He'll have to be forced off," replied Stewart, quietly. "The Don's pretty slick, but his vaqueros are bad actors. It's just this way: Don Carlos has vaqueros coming and going all the time. They're guerrilla bands, that's all. And they're getting uglier. There have been several shooting-scrapes lately. It's only a matter of time till something stirs up the boys here. Stillwell, you know Nels and Monty and Nick."

"Sure I know 'em, an' you're not mentionin' one more particular cowboy in my outfit," said Stillwell, with a dry chuckle and a glance at Stewart.

Madeline divined the covert meaning. "Stewart, I see you carry a gun," she said, pointing to a black handle protruding from a sheath swinging low along his leather chaps.

"Yes, ma'am."

"Why do you carry it?" she asked.

"Well," he said, "it's not a pretty gun—and it's heavy."

She caught the inference. The gun was not an ornament. His keen, steady, dark gaze caused her vague alarm. What had once seemed cool and audacious about this cowboy was now cold and powerful and mystical. Both her instinct and her intelligence realized the steel fiber of the man's nature. As she was his employer, she had the right to demand that he should not do what was so chillingly manifest that he might do. But Madeline could not demand. She felt curiously young and weak, and the five months of western life were as if they had never been. She now had to do with a question involving human life. And the value she placed upon human life and its spiritual significance was a matter far from her cowboy's thoughts. A strange idea flashed up. Did she place too much value upon all human life? She checked that, wondering, almost horrified at herself. And then her intuition told her that she possessed a far stronger power to move these primitive men than any woman's stern rule or order.

"Stewart, I do not fully understand what you hint that Nels and his comrades might do. Please be frank with me. Do you mean Nels would shoot upon little provocation?"

"Miss Hammond, as far as Nels is concerned, shooting is now just a matter of his meeting Don Carlos' vaqueros. As for Nick Steele and Monty, they're just bad men, and looking for trouble."

"How about yourself, Stewart? Stillwell's remark was not lost upon me," said Madeline, prompted by curiosity. "Stewart, I have come to love my ranch, and I care a great deal for my—my cowboys. It would be dreadful if they were to kill anybody, or especially if one of them should be killed."

"Miss Hammond, you've changed things considerable out here, but you can't change these men. All that's needed to start them is a little trouble. And this Mexican revolution is bound to make rough times along some of the wilder passes across the border. We're in line, that's all. And the boys are getting stirred up."

"Very well, then, I must accept the inevitable. I am facing a rough time. And some of my cowboys cannot be checked much longer. But human life is not for any man to sacrifice unless in self-defense or in protecting those dependent upon him. What Stillwell and you hinted makes me afraid of Nels and Nick Steele and Monty. Cannot they be controlled? I want to feel that they will not go gunning for Don Carlos' men. I want to avoid all violence. And yet when my guests come I want to feel that they will be safe from danger or fright or even annoyance. May I not rely wholly upon you, Stewart?"

"I hope so, Miss Hammond," replied Stewart. It was an instant response, but none the less fraught with consciousness of responsibility. He waited a moment, and then, as neither Stillwell nor Madeline offered further speech, he bowed and turned down the path, his long spurs clinking in the gravel.

"Wal, wal," exclaimed Stillwell, "thet's no little job you give him, Miss Majesty."

"It was a woman's cunning, Stillwell," said Alfred. "Majesty, whatever actuated you, it was a stroke of diplomacy. Stewart has got good stuff in him. He was down and out. Well, he's made a game fight, and it looks as if he'd win. Trusting him, giving him responsibility, relying upon him, was the surest way to strengthen his hold upon himself. But, Majesty, remember, he's a composite of tiger breed and forked lightning, and don't imagine he has failed you if he gets into a fight."

CHAPTER X

Don Carlos' Vaqueros.

Early the following morning Stewart, with a company of cowboys, departed for Don Carlos' rancho. As the day wore on without any report from him, Stillwell appeared to grow more at ease; and at nightfall he told Madeline that he guessed there was now no reason for concern.

"Wal, though it's sure amazin' strange," he continued, "I've been worryin' some about how we was goin' to fire Don Carlos. But Gene has a way of doin' things."

Next day Stillwell and Alfred decided to ride over to Don Carlos' place, taking Madeline and Florence with them, and upon the return to stop at Alfred's ranch. They started in the cool, gray dawn, and after three hours' riding, as the sun began to get bright, they entered a mesquite grove, surrounding corrals and barns, and a number of low, squat buildings and a huge, rambling structure all built of adobe and mostly crumbling to ruin. Only one green spot relieved the bald red of grounds and walls; and this evidently was made by the spring which had given both value and fame to Don Carlos' range. The approach to the house was through a wide courtyard, bare, stony, hard packed, with hitching-rails and watering-troughs in front of a long porch. Several dusty, tired horses stood with drooping heads and bridles down, their wet flanks attesting to travel just ended.

"Wal, dog-gone it, Al, if there ain't Pat Hawe's hoss I'll eat it," exclaimed Stillwell.

"What's Pat want here, anyhow?" growled Alfred.

No one was in sight; but Madeline heard loud voices coming from the house. Stillwell dismounted at the porch and stalked in at the door. Alfred leaped off his horse, helped Florence and Madeline down, and, bidding them rest and wait on the porch, he followed Stillwell.

From the corridor came the rattling of spurs, tramping of boots, and loud voices. Madeline detected Alfred's quick notes when he was annoyed: "We'll rustle back home, then," he said. The answer came, "No!" Madeline recognized Stewart's voice, and she quickly straightened up. "I won't have them in here," went on Alfred.

"Outdoors or in, they've got to be with us!" replied Stewart, sharply. "Listen, Al," came the boom of Stillwell's big voice, "now that we've butted in over hyar with the girls, you let Stewart run things."

Then a crowd of men tramped pell-mell out upon the porch. Stewart, dark-browed and somber, was in the lead. Nels hung close to him, and Madeline's quick glance saw that Nels had undergone indescribable change. The grinning, brilliant-eyed Don Carlos came jostling out beside a giant, sharp-featured man wearing a silver shield. This, no doubt, was Pat Hawe. In the background behind Stillwell and Alfred stood Nick Steele, head and shoulders over a number of vaqueros and cowboys.

"Miss Hammond, I'm sorry you came," said Stewart, bluntly. "We're in a muddle here. I've insisted that you and Flo be kept close to us. I'll explain later. If you can't stop your ears I beg you to overlook rough talk."

With that he turned to the men behind him: "Nick, take Booly, go back to Monty and the boys. Fetch out that stuff. All of it. Rustle, now!"

Stillwell and Alfred disengaged themselves from the crowd to take up positions in front of Madeline and Florence. Pat Hawe leaned against a post and insolently ogled Madeline and then Florence. Don Carlos pressed forward. His swarthy face showed dark lines, like cords, under the surface. His little eyes were exceedingly prominent and glittering. To Madeline his face seemed to be a bold, handsome mask through which his eyes piercingly betrayed the evil nature of the man.

Then a Crowd of Men Tramped Pell-Mell Out Upon the Porch.

He bowed low with elaborate and sinuous grace. His smile revealed brilliant teeth, enhanced the brilliance of his eyes. He slowly spread deprecatory hands.

"Senoritas, I beg a thousand pardons," he said. How strange it was for Madeline to hear English spoken in a soft, whiningly sweet accent! "The gracious hospitality of Don Carlos has passed with his house."

Stewart stepped forward and, thrusting Don Carlos aside, he called, "Make way, there!"

The crowd fell back to the tramp of heavy boots. Cowboys appeared staggering out of the corridor with long boxes. These they placed side by side upon the floor of the porch.

"Now, Hawe, we'll proceed with our business," said Stewart. "You see these boxes, don't you?"

"I reckon I see a good many things round hyar," replied Hawe, meaningly.

"Well, do you intend to open these boxes upon my say-so?"

"No!" retorted Hawe. "It's not my place to meddle with property as come by express an' all accounted fer regular."

"I'll open them. Here, one of you boys, knock the tops off these boxes," ordered Stewart. "No, not you, Monty. You use your eyes. Let Booly handle the ax. Rustle, now!"

Monty Price had jumped out of the crowd into the middle of the porch. The manner in which he gave way to Booly and faced the vaqueros was not significant of friendliness or trust.

"Stewart, you're dead wrong to bust open them boxes. That's ag'in' the law," protested Hawe, trying to interfere.

Stewart pushed him back. Then Don Carlos, who had been stunned by the appearance of the boxes, suddenly became active in speech and person. Stewart thrust him back also. The Mexican's excitement increased. He wildly gesticulated; he exclaimed shrilly in Spanish. When, however, the lids were wrenched open and an inside packing torn away he grew rigid and silent. Madeline raised herself behind Stillwell to see that the boxes were full of rifles and ammunition.

"There, Hawe! What did I tell you?" demanded Stewart. "I came over here to take charge of this ranch. I found these boxes hidden in an unused room. I suspected what they were. Contraband goods!"

"Wal, supposin' they are? I don't see any call fer sech all-fired fuss as you're makin'. Stewart, I calkilate you're some stuck on your new job an' want to make a big show before—"

"Hawe, stop slinging that kind of talk," interrupted Stewart. "You got too free with your mouth once before! Now here, I'm supposed to be consulting an officer of the law. Will you take charge of these contraband goods?"

"Say, you're holdin' on high an' mighty," replied Hawe, in astonishment that was plainly pretended. "What're you drivin' at?"

Stewart muttered an imprecation. He took several swift strides across the porch; he held out his hands to Stillwell as if to indicate the hopelessness of intelligent and reasonable arbitration; he looked at Madeline with a glance eloquent of his regret that he could not handle the situation to please her. Then as he wheeled he came face to face with Nels, who had slipped forward out of the crowd.

Madeline gathered serious import from the steel-blue meaning flash of eyes whereby Nels communicated something to Stewart. Whatever that something was, it dispelled Stewart's impatience. A slight movement of his hand brought Monty Price forward with a jump. In these sudden jumps of Monty's there was a suggestion of restrained ferocity. Then Nels and Monty lined up behind Stewart. It was a deliberate action, even to Madeline, unmistakably formidable. Pat Hawe's face took on an ugly look; his eyes had a reddish gleam. Don Carlos added a pale face and extreme nervousness to his former expressions of agitation. The cowboys edged away from the vaqueros and the bronzed, bearded horsemen who were evidently Hawe's assistants.

"I'm driving at this," spoke up Stewart, presently; and now he was slow and caustic. "Here's contraband of war! Hawe, do you get that? Arms and ammunition for the rebels across the border! I charge you as an officer to confiscate these goods and to arrest the smuggler—Don Carlos."

These words of Stewart's precipitated a riot among Don Carlos and his followers, and they surged wildly around the sheriff. The crowd around Don Carlos grew louder and denser with the addition of armed vaqueros and bare-footed stable-boys and dusty-booted herdsmen and blanketed Mexicans, the last of whom suddenly slipped from doors and windows and round corners. Shrill cries, evidently from Don Carlos, somewhat quieted the commotion. Then Don Carlos could be heard addressing Sheriff Hawe in an exhortation of mingled English and Spanish. He denied, he avowed, he proclaimed, and all in rapid, passionate utterance.

It seemed to Madeline that Don Carlos denied knowledge of the boxes of contraband goods, then knowledge of their real contents, then knowledge of their destination, and, finally, everything except that they were there in sight, damning witnesses to somebody's complicity in the breaking of neutrality laws. Passionate as had been his denial of all this, it was as nothing compared to his denunciation of Stewart.

"All over the ride. Bolt now and keep your nerve!"

LEGION MAN STATE ENGINEER

R. L. Cochran, World War Veteran, Is Honored by Governor Bryan of Nebraska.

The office of state engineer of Nebraska has been awarded to R. L. Cochran, of Lincoln, a member of the American Legion who spent fourteen months overseas during the World war. His appointment was made by Governor Bryan.

A graduate of the University of Nebraska, Cochran's first job was that of a rodman with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railroad. Then he was elected surveyor of Lincoln county and also maintained a private practice as consulting engineer. In 1916, he was appointed state bridge inspector and later investigated a dispute between the states of Wyoming and Nebraska over water rights pending a Supreme court trial.

Appointed deputy state engineer in 1917, Cochran's career in that office was cut short by his enlistment in the engineering corps of the army. He was transferred to the coast artillery as a first lieutenant and went into training at Fortress Monroe. His overseas service began in December, 1917, and in July, 1918, he was made a captain of artillery.

R. L. Cochran.

Following discharge he went to North Platte, Neb., where he formed a partnership to resume private practice. Under the supervision of his firm, ninety-one blocks of paving material were built in North Platte.

NEW CONTESTS AMONG POSTS

Rehabilitation Committee Proposes Plan to Create Interest in Veterans' Bureau Problems.

The national rehabilitation committee of the American Legion is proposing to chairmen of local districts that a contest, based on the work of the posts in the district, toward aiding ex-service men to regain their places in community life, be conducted, with the purpose of creating active post interest in the problems of the disabled men and the veterans' bureau.

A communication from Joe Sparks, chairman of the national committee, states that, "While, of course, no incentive in the way of a trophy is required to have any Legion post assist its disabled comrades, nevertheless it is felt that the presentation of a loving cup to the post performing the most service to our disabled comrades would express appropriately the appreciation of the department awarding the cup, and would at the same time furnish a tangible honor to which the post could point with pride."

The winner of the contest in each department would be decided by the score piled up on a basis of points. These points, Mr. Sparks suggests, could be allotted in the following manner, based on the efforts of the post: Twenty-five for every man hospitalized, 20 for every man awarded compensation, 15 for every man awarded section 2 training, 5 for every man awarded section 3 training, 5 for every $1,000 insurance reinstated, 5 for every training opportunity offered and accepted, and 25 for every job for trained veterans offered and accepted.

It is further suggested that each department officer furnish the posts within its district with concise summaries of the most efficient manner of accomplishing the desired results, so that no unnecessary labor be done.

"It is felt," the communication from Mr. Sparks concludes, "by the committee that the effect of such a contest will be to arouse a friendly rivalry which will result in increased service to our disabled comrades. We believe that if this same idea is carried out in every state department the results nationally will be shown in less complaints on the part of claimants within a short space of time."

Legion Aids Hospital.

American Legion posts in Indianapolis, Ind., the home of the national organization, joined in a city-wide campaign to endow the James Whitcomb Riley Memorial Hospital for Crippled Children. A team for this purpose was provided by the Legion posts of the Seventh district. At least one auxiliary unit will endow a room in the hospital, according to the announcement of the unit officers.

Funds Awarded to Post.

In a suit brought by American Legion members of Warren, O., against the trustees of the local war chest community fund, Judge Charles Wilkins of the Common Pleas court awarded the post $57,034.82, as its portion of the fund, which had been raised for the benefit of soldiers and sailors during the war. Other posts of the county also shared in the division.

STILLE'S IMPLEMENT NEWS

VOLUME 1. Klemme, Iowa, June 14, 1923 NUMBER

A DOUBLE PURPOSE MACHINE

Such is the McCormick- Deering combined side delivery rake and tedder. It is extremely simple yet sturdy in construction. It can be made either rake or ted by simple process of moving an easily reached lever. In raking it puts the hay in loose air y windrows and deposits it on clean stubble without shattering the leaves and blossoms. This promotes even, fast curing and high quality hay, bear in mind that its air curing, not sun bleaching, that puts the quality in hay. Let us tell you more about this machine and other McCormick-Deering hay machines, including loaders, sweep rakes and stackers, self dump rakes, tedders, and McCormick-Deering mowers.

STILLE HANDS US A COUPLE

..Our Devil Remodels His Ad and Gets Us in Bad

The Stille Implement Co.'s adver-tisement has been attracting a lot of attention the past few weeks and all on account of the dropping of one little insignificant letter "t".

This is how it went: Mr. Stille was running a nice little speil on Twine, telling the natives to order Twine at once, etc. Our devil must have run out of the letter "t" on the linotype, because when the paper was printed and mailed ,Stille at once began to get phone orders from all over. Instead of advertising to order Twine, the darn Devil had it read "Order Your Supply of Wine now, ours is the best" and so on. So now we take the opportunity to inform our readers that Stille's Wine begins with a "T" and is not drinkable but is he vtry best to use on your binder. The best Stille can do to satisfy you thirst is to sell you some En-Ar-Co Motor oil and if it dos not satisfy your own thirst, at least it will make your flivver feel fine.

Gosh, ain't it too bad that it was-n't wine at that? We would have an awful time trying to drink wine with "t" in front of it.

That's one on the Editor alright. Us for the old oaken bucket that hung in the well!

SCOUT CORNER

BY M. T. HEAD

Th Klemme Boy Scous enjoyed a day's outing at Ventura Heights last Friday. They left about ten o'clock. In due time they arrived their and of course the first thing on the pro-gram was to establish a camp. After this and enough fire wood for the noonday meal had been brought, everybody went SWIMMING! Oh! Boy Ain't it a grand and a glorious feeling. Ask any of the scouts that were over there and we think that it will be safe to bet that you will get a unamious answer in the af-firmative. After an hour of Lake living everybody sought to satisfy that terrible appetite that one gets after a good swim. On these ou-ings every scout furnishes his own "grub" and of course he has to cook it himself too, and maybe what you think would be the worst part of it all would be to eat the meal that you had prepared over a campfire, bu say! did you ever try it. The scouts are getting to be real artists in this method of cooking, and when you smell the aroma of coffee, bacon and eggs and the rest of the meal in the air. it sure does give you an appetite. And maybe you think those boys don't eat. We would advise you to ask some of the moth-ers how much of their food the boys carry away for a rip.

After dinner some of the boys played horseshoe and basebal; o-thers read and some of them even attempted to go to sleep. But that is about as far as they go, for when they would be getting drowsy they would get a shower with cold water, or somebody would accident-ly (?) miss a ball and it would hit the poor tired one. One bright il-lustrious scout with great inventive genious even revived part of the story of Gulliver's Travels, by try-ing to tie his assistant scoutmaster down as the little people of the is-land of Lilliput did with Gulliver, but as this ingenious scout was drov ing a stake b his magesty's leg he ac cidently missed it with his hammre and hit his A S. M. instead.

Another swim followed and thne supper. After waiting about an hour after this meal, everybo ly went swimming again.

It was a tired but happy bunch of boys that hailed in Klemme that night about seven o'clock. Every body is eagerly looking forward to the next hike which wi come ff in a cupe f weeks.

Hey! You Scouts.

Don't forget the meeting next Tuesday evening at the Scout head-quarters. First cal at 7:15 sharp. Assembly at 7:45 sharp. This is a regular meeting and you should ap-pear in full uniform. This is go-ing to be important so please come. Plans will be made for the summer's outing at this time.

SHRINERS CONVENTION AT WASH-INGTON VERY PATRIOTIC

A CONVENTION OF PATRIOTISM

The city of Washington has just finished entertaining the annual con vention of Shriners.. In a pecular sense the nation was the host, for Washington not only is governed and financed by Congress, but dur-ing the convention many agencies of the federal government actively par-ticipated to make it a success.

Furthurmore, President Harding himself a member of the Shrine at Columbus, Ohio, took an active part in all of the Shrine ceremonies, and with Mrs. Harding reviewing all the parades. The White House was thrown open and was daily visited literally by thousands of Shriners in attendence at the convention. Scores of delegates paid formal calls upon the President and the ladies of the convention paid especial tribute to the First Lady of the Land.

Postmaster General New, another noble, a member of the Murat Tem-ple at Indianapolis, established a Shrine Postoffice and rendered 100 percent effecient postal accomoda-tion to the hundreds of thousands of visitors during the week. Secre-tary of Labor Davis was a speaker at one of the Shrine meetings.

One of the chief features of en-tertainment were the exibition drills and maneuvers of units furnished by the army and navy. The navy made additionl contribution by giving on the Potomc River while both army and navy fliers gave aerial circuses each day. The show places of the federl government, such as the Con-gressional Library, Burea of Print-ing and Engraving, etc. made an es-pecial effort to entertain the visi-tors.

But the outstanding feature of the convention was the patriotic fer-vor of he delegates of Shriners which was matched only by the en-thusiam with which the tens of thou sands of spectators greeted such ex-hibition. Over 100 bands furnish-ed music almost 24 hours a day. At a dozen different places in the city there was a band concert staged from morning to night, not mention-ing the impromptu concerts furnish-ed in hotel buildings and on street corners. Yet patroitic airs were al ways received with roars of applause and cheers from the crowds. When ever the strains of the Star Spangled Banner were lifted above the blare the street it invariably brought hats off and hands lifted to salute.

It was during the parade, howe-ver, that the hundreds of thousands who were in Washington furnished the most significant exhibition of their intense nationalism. Of course every delegation was headed by a color- bearer with the American flag and in many cases each unit of a delegation. No flag passed the re view stand that was not saluted by President Harding, Mrs. Harding and others in the stand. In this re-spect crowds were in one accord, for they, too saluted the passing nation-tional colors.

But when the delegation from Chicago passed with several stand-ards of the national colors and with their immense drum bearing the in-scription

"One heart, one hand,
One flag, one land,
One country,"

those in seats arose and joined with those standing in cheer after cheer.

The spirit of America prevaded and predominated the entire conven tion. There was no politics. There were no partisans. All were Amer-icans. As Thomas Jefferson ex-claim in his first inaugral address, "Every difference in opinion is not a difference of principles. We are all Republicans; we are all Federa-lists." And so in this convention the outstanding fact that although del-egaions were composed of Republi-cans and Democrats, radicals and conservatives, none of these distinc-tions were thought of because all Americans with whom the institu-tions of our nation and the honor of Old Glory stood first..

Had the visiting thousands been asked to give utterance to the thot upermost in their minds, they would no doubt have all subscribed to the sentiments expressed by Daniel Web ster in his speech of dedication of the Bunker H ill Monument:

"Our principal business is improv-ement. Let our age be the age of improvement. In a day of peace let us advance the arts of peace and the works of peace. Let us develope the resources of our land, call forth its powers, build up its institutions, and promote its great interests.——Let our object be, our country, our whole country and nothing but our country.

GARNER MASONIC TEMPLE PASS FIFTY YEAR MARK

RUST ATTACKS RASPBERRIES.

Eradication of Diseased Plants and SPray Control Measures

Total eradication of diseased plants and spraying of uninfested ones are the methods recommended by R. H. Porter, specialist in plant diseases at Iowa State College: for the control of orange leaf rust of raspberries, which has been report-ed in many parts of the state.

The disease is characterized by an orange colored powder which com-pletely covers the under surface of the leaves. The rust lives over the winter in the old roots and grows up thru the new shoots in the spring. It is common on wild raspberries and blackberries and is readily spread to cultivated plantations.

The spray that Mr. Porter recom-mends for protection against the rust consists of one gallon of com-mercial liquid lime sulfur in 40 gal-lons of water.

Thornton will have its annual gala day next Thursday, June 28th, and the big event will be called American Legion Day and Farm Bu-reau Picnic. There will be a picnic dinner at noon and in the afternoon, before the ball game there will be all kinds of street sports with many prizes.—Hampton Chronicle.

WHAT MEN ARE

Men are what women marry. They have two feet, two hands. and some times two wives, but never more than one collar or one idea at a time.

Making a husband out of a man re quires science, sculpture, common sense, faith, hope and charity.

If you flatter a man it frightens him to death. If you permit him to make love to you he gets tired of you in the end, and if you don't he tires of you in the beginning. If you believe all he tells you he thinks you are a fool, and if you don't he thinks you are a cynic.

If you wear gay clothes and rouge he hesitates to take you out, and if you wear a brown toque and tailor-made. he takes you out and stares all evening at a women in gay colors rouge and a startling hat.

If you are popular with other men he is jealous, and if your not he hesitates to marry a wall flower.Ex

BUGS AND BOYS A MENACE TO MELONS

Bancroft Register:—Art Lindsey who is raising a four acre patch of water melons and an acre of musk melons, has been a pretty busy man lately. The news seemed to have been noised around in bugdom that the picking was fine in Art's melon patch and about all the bugs east of the Missouri river congregated there for a feast. A liberal helping of slug shot, arsenate of lead and other bug dainties kind of helped the situation along although they had to be applied to the plants sev eral times owing to the fact that shower happened along right after each application of the bug medicine Asked if he anticipated any trouble with boys raiding his patch this fall he remarked "that he expected to be on guard every evening with a pair of dogs for a starter and if the occasion required it he would employ armed force to protect the patch". Our best advice to any kids in this section of the country who have a hankering to taste Art's mel ons, is to go and interview him in daylight.

GARNER MASONS IN BIG CELE-BRATION

50th Anniversity of Lodge Observed Eastern Stars Lend Assistance

GARNER, June 27.—Observance of the 50 anniversity the night of June 22 of Bethel Lodge No. 319 was an event of unusual interest to the Masonic fraternity of Garner. Members in the Eastern Star cooper-ated in the event in which nearly 175 joined. A delicious three cour-se banquet was perfectly served fol-lowing a blessing by the Rev. Newal pastor of the Congretional church. Prof. Charles Worshipful Master Tompkins made an ideal toastmast-er. In the welcome o all especially to L. B. Baily, the only surviving charter member, Mr. Tompkins drew a parallel between the charter members who blazed the trail with their trials and hardships of pioneer making the point that every thing worth while is brought out through sacrfice and devoion. Worthp Ma-tron Mrs. Harvey Sweigard on be-half of the Eastern Star. expressed pleasure in co-operating in the hap-py event with special deference to Mr. Bailey and wished for all:

"I pray the prayer the Easteners do:
May the peace of Allah abide with you,
Wherever you stay. where ever you go, ..
May the beautiful palms of Allah grow.
Through the days of labor and night of rest,
The love of good Allah make you blest.
So I touch my heart as the Eastern-ers do,
May the peace of Allah abide with you."

Mr. Bailey, an active Mason for the past 56 years and is now in the eighties, gave an interesting talk on early conditions. He mentioned that it was often hard have a quorum, that billiard cues were used for staffs and dry goods boxes as alters.

Banker Issac Sweigard in glowing terms, expressed appreciation of the membership. Caspar Moe and Charles Terwilliger. twins of the lodge in that they have taken all the work together, followed in an ap-prective talk. Mr. Moe was espec-ially enthusiastic and entertaining and convulsed his hearers with hu-mor. Mr. Moe has livtd ptars in Ames, but in his opinion, no other lodge can equal Bethel.

Atty. Fred Blackstone emphasized the thought that a good Mason was a good American citizen. Captain Jones of military unit in Garner for the night. told of Masonry in the army. At Fort Snelling, he said there are 56 Masons and one from every state in the union. Captain Jones took the work in Cuba in the Spanish language. One of the sol-diers took the work in China. Five other soldiers of the unit in Garner for the night were guests of the eve-ning.

Hyde, Tessier and Fraser furnish-ed the music.

LEVIATHAN SETS NEW SPEED MARK

Steams Tewnty-Eight Knots an Hour, Breaking Mauretania's Record.

WARM TOAST FOR LASKER

Uncle Sam Now Has the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Comfortable Passenger-Carrying Vessel in the World.

On Board S. S. Leviathan, June 23.—The American flag, taut under pressure of the wind, was swept along by this mighty ship in the making of a world's record for merchant vessels. In a sixty-hour run, beginning off Jupiter Light, Florida, the Leviathan maintained 28.4 knots an hour.

The previous record was that of the Cunarder Mauretania—27.94 knots an hour.

Thus, not only has the United States the largest, the best equipped and the most comfortable passenger-carrying vessel afloat, but she has the fastest.

When the oil burning engines were slowly opened toward capacity bulletins on the speed pickup were distributed every few minutes. As the rush of the 950-foot long monster gradually increased from 23 to 24 to 25 to 26 knots an hour the racing spirit took possession of every one.

"Twenty-seven knots," was reported.

Then the Mauretania's greatest speed was equaled—passed!

The Leviathan accomplished its speed record under adverse conditions, the naval experts aboard say.

Everybody on board celebrated the achievement in nautical fashion—drinking clamorous toasts to the United States, to the Leviathan and to Al Lasker, shipping board head, who directed the program for the reconditioning of the vessel. The toasts were drunk in iced tea, of course. There is nothing else on board.

The third was one of the two Germans who killed a Belgian corporal and a private and wounded another private near Recklinghausen when the Belgians tried to search them.

WAR PRISONERS FREE

President Harding Pardons Seventy-four Federal Convicts.

Acts on 158 Applications of Persons Convicted of Various Crimes, Including Bootlegging, Bigamy.

Washington, June 21.—President Harding granted executive clemency to seventy-four persons, including twenty-seven World war prisoners.

The President, before starting on his Alaskan trip, acted on 158 pardons and commutation cases, a record-breaking number in the opinion of Department of Justice officials.

He granted thirty conditional and fourteen unconditional commutations, one full pardon, restored civil rights to twenty-seven former prisoners and denied eighty-four applications for pardons or commutations.

Interest centers in the cases of those convicted of violating the espionage, draft and other war laws.

These numbered forty-eight, and the President granted commutations to twenty-seven, but denied applications in twenty-one cases, including a group of twenty alleged members of the Industrial Workers of the World convicted at Sacramento, Cal.

In addition to the cases growing out of war law violations, the President's orders included clemency for many other prisoners convicted of offenses ranging from bigamy to bootlegging and including violations of the mail fraud, Mann white slave, bribery and other statutes.

I. W. W. Protests Pardon Conditions of President

Washington, June 22. — Protest against the conditions made by President Harding in commuting sentences of political prisoners in the Chicago and Wichita espionage cases has been sounded by the I. W. W. defense committee. The committee contends that the President's demand that the ex-prisoners promise to obey the laws cannot be insisted on because the amnesty committee has decided that all are free-speech cases, which do not involve violation of the law.

Cold Wave in Three States; Other Forty-five Sizzle

Nearer home, at Superior, Wis., people hurriedly dug their woolens and overcoats out of the mothballs as the temperature slipped to 40.

HARDING COURT BARS LEAGUE

New Plans Are Offered by President in His First Tour Speech.

TRUE WORLD BODY SOUGHT

Executive's Address at St. Louis, Anti Court Hotbed, Includes Proposal to Take Tribunal From League of Nations.

St. Louis, Mo., June 22.—President Harding in a speech at the Coliseum here proposed to meet all objections to his plan for membership in the international court set up by the League of Nations by changing the plan. As a condition of American adherence, he suggested that the court be made self-perpetuating.

By empowering the existing court, as set up by the league to fill its own vacancies, he said, it could be made independent of the league in the future.

This startling suggestion and several other entirely new reservations were advanced by Mr. Harding before a big audience which received him cordially, although without any marked enthusiasm for his argument.

Governor Hyde of Missouri, an avowed opponent of the Harding-Hughes court scheme, was the President's official host.

Other suggestions by the President, apparently intended to soften the opposition to his court plan, may be summarized as follows:

Continuation of the existing authority of the permanent Hague court of arbitration to nominate the judges.

Transfer of the power to elect from the council and assembly to the League of Nations to the remaining members of the permanent court of international justice, which is the official title of the league court.

Compensation of the judges to be fixed, expenditures to be supervised, national contributions to be apportioned, and similar duties to be performed not by the league, but either by the Hague court of arbitration or a special commission to be designated by the member nations.

Abolishment of extension to any member or group of member nations the exclusive privilege now held by the league of seeking advisory legal guidance from the international court.

Disparity in voting between the United States and other nations on one side and the British empire on the other to be met by a self-perpetuating arrangement.

King of Italy Gauges Lava With His Cane

Rome, June 22.—With the fury of Mount Etna's eruption dying down, King Victor Emmanuel left Catania for Rome. At the same time it was announced that Italy would not ask outside aid for the sufferers but would be able to care for them herself. During his stay the king visited the head of the lava stream, measuring with his walking stick the rate of advance.

Germany Seeks to Set Mark at 100,000 for $1

Berlin, June 22.—With the total circulation of German paper money aggregating well over eleven trillion marks, an attempt is to be made to drive the mark upward and hold it at 100,000 to the dollar, it is announced. An agreement has been reached between the principal banks of Germany and the government to centralize dealing in foreign exchange.

DR. A. MEIKLEJOHN

The seniors at Amherst college, at Amherst, Mass., threatened to refuse to accept degrees or attend graduation exercises unless assurances were given that Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn would not be ousted as president of the institution. Other undergraduates threatened to attend other colleges than Amherst next fall. The tempest has been brewing ever since 1921 when older alumni clamored for the dismissal of Dr. Meiklejohn, criticizing his liberal, or as his critics say, his "radical" attitude toward life, college and religion.

AS NATIONAL SHRINE

DAUGHTERS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION SAVE MONTPELIER.

Home of General Henry Knox, Revolutionary Patriot, Will Be Reproduced Exactly as It Was.

General Knox chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, announce that it is well under way in its campaign to procure the necessary funds with which to reconstruct as a national shrine, Montpelier, the old home of Gen. Henry Knox.

Although the buildings comprising Montpelier were razed in 1871, the chapter is in possession of complete plans, printings, and drawings of both the interior and exterior, from which it will be possible to exactly reproduce the buildings as they appeared when General Knox entertained Louis Philip, afterward king of France, and General Lafayette, his personal friend.

General Knox was born in Boston and as a young man was employed by Wharton & Barnes, booksellers, on Cornhill. Recognizing the inevitable conflict he studied the art of fortifying and defending besieged towns and in November, 1775, was appointed by the Continental congress as a colonel of artillery. One of the important feats of the war was his transportation of 60 fieldpieces from the shores of Lake Champlain to Boston during the middle of a severe winter. For this work he was placed in charge of the fortifications in Boston and later in New York and the South.

Throughout the war General Knox was a prominent figure, and history records that when it was decided to operate against Lord Cornwallis in Virginia it was his skill and energy in providing and forwarding heavy cannon for the siege of Yorktown that caused General Washington to report to the president of congress that "the resources of his genius supplied the deficit of means."

When the project of General Knox chapter is finally completed Maine will have one of the greatest shrines of the country, dedicated to one of its greatest patriots.

British Evacuation of New York.

November 25, 1783, the British troops evacuated New York city. Evacuation day was at one time celebrated with much enthusiasm, but of late has been almost entirely neglected.

The rear guard of the British army embarked at the Battery, and the advance guard of the American forces marched down the Bowery and through Chatham, Queen and Wall streets to Broadway and Rector street. They were followed by Washington and his generals, the city council, and other functionaries. A few weeks later Washington bade farewell to his officers at Fraunce's tavern at Broad and Pearl streets.

Lafayette.

Gilbert Du Motier de Lafayette was born in the castle of Chavagnac, Auvergne, France, and was left an orphan when thirteen years old, having large estates. He revisited America after the war in 1784 and in 1824-25, and both times was received with enthusiasm and affection. The latter visit was, in fact, in the nature of a triumphal progress, for Lafayette's first support of democratic principles in France had increased the esteem in which he was held in America. Congress voted him a grant of $200,000 and a township of land in Florida. He died in Paris May 20, 1834.

Philip Freneau Auth of the First Ameri Poem of Indepe

Now the two great Englis nations, the United States a Britain, happily are on terms but in the days of the "s there was a feeling against th country intensely violent, as by the appended verses. Ph neau, author of the poem, was American poet of any note. born in 1752 in New York, wa ated from Princeton in 177 1775, at the age of twenty-t wrote this bitterly satirical p titled "Emancipation From Br pendence." The next year Inde was declared by the Continen gress. Freneau lived to the eighty, dying near Freehold, N in 1832.

From a junta that labor for power,
Whose schemes, disappointed made them look sour;
From the lords of the council, w against freedom,
Who still follow on where shall lead 'em;

From groups at St. James' wh our petitions
And fools that are waiting for submissions;
From a nation whose manne rough and abrupt,
From scoundrels and rascals gold can corrupt;

From pirates sent out by com the king
To murder and plunder, but swing;
From Wallace and Graves and and roses

From slaves that would die for from the throne,
From assemblies that vote agai gress' proceedings,
Who now see the fruit of thei misleadings;

"Don't Sacrifice That Good Friendly Car"

Read These Startling Facts

STORMIZING cylinders is more vitally impor- tant to your motor than oil and grease. Cylinders do not get the attention they need because they are the hidden part of the engine, and are never seen, their condition never noted—in fact some car owners never think of them, do't seem to know they are there. You replace your brake bands because they become worn. Think of the "HEART OF YOUR MOTOR"—the cylinders which must continue to throb if you are to use your car at all.

Cylinders are the hardest worked and worn part of the motor, traveling up and down 120,000 to 180,000 times per hour, 25,000 miles of friction in every 10,000 miles car travel and one of the most delicate and important parts. Of course they wear, just a natural wear of two moving surfaces rubbing together. A cylinder to function properly must be perfectly smooth and round, not varying more than one thousandth as to roundness, the hole must be straight and absolutely square with base of the motor block. The slightest variation from this PERFECTION causes trouble; the cyl- inders function improperly, the other working part of the motor function improperly, the motor s en- tire running order is ff. And this causes destruc- tin of the motor and its parts, oil leaks, quick car- bonizing, gasoline waste, since gasoline leaking by the rings into the crank case will thin the oil, de- stroy its lubricating quasities, which may result in scored cylinders or even burned out bearings, skip- ping, weeakened power, rapid depreciation, rat- tles, noises, rumblings and grumblings noticeable in motors—that "SOMETHING WRONG" feeling the driver gets from the wheel. Removal of car- bon, grinding of valves, new piston rings, or the usual tunning up don't overcome these troubles. The hole is worn oval, you can't fit rund parts to a worn oval hole, regaardless of the design of he parts—the cause must be removed; THE CYLIN- DERS MUST BE RESTORED TO PERFECT SMOOTHNESS AND CYLINDRICAL ACCURACY, THE CYLINDERS MUST BE STORMIZED. There is where is where the whole fault lies, there is the fundamental reason for motor troubles. And the only way to correct truble is to remove the cause—STORMIZING THE CYLINDERS AND RE- NEW THE PISTONS AND RINGS.

The Farmer and the Freight Rate

HERE are the facts about the Farmer and the Freight Rate, developed at a recent investigation into grain rates before the Interstate Commerce Commission and based on Government reports, testimony of farm representa- tives and data from railroad records:

A ten percent reduction in wheat rates would mean an average saving in freight charges of $9.40 per year per farm in Kansas!

On all grains, an average saving of $6.92 per year per farm in Iowa on shipments to the Chicago market!

An average saving of $3.62 per year per farm in Minnesota on shipments to the Chicago market!

Such a rate reduction would hardly yield the average farmer enough to buy a Ford tire.

It would not increase farm prices. The frac- tion of a cent per bushel represented by the reduction would be lost in daily fluctuations of the markets.

Freight rates on grain have been stationary eighteen months, yet grain prices have been advancing—and fluctuating!—on the farm.

The facts disprove the claim sometimes made that a ten percent reduction in rates is necessary for farm prosperity.

On the other hand, the reduction would cost the Rock Island $1,700,000 annually, the price of 28 locomotives or 800 freight cars.

The loss of that amount last year would have meant that the Rock Island System would have operated a whole year without returns for thousands who have their savings in it and are justly entitled to a fair return.

If the railroads are to expand their facilities they must earn enough to attract new capital.

Can you afford to imperil your railroad service for $3 or $6 or $9 per farm per year?

"HURRY, MADELINE!"

NOPSIS.—Arriving at the lone- little railroad station at El Ca- New Mexico, Madeline Ham- d, New York society girl, finds one to meet her. While in the ting room, a drunken cowboy ers, asks if she is married, and arts, leaving her terrified. He urns with a priest, who goes ough some sort of ceremony, the cowboy forces her to say ." Asking her name and learn- her identity the cowboy seems ed. In a shooting scrape out- the room a Mexican is killed. cowboy lets a girl, Bonita, his horse and escape, then ducts Madeline to Florence ingsley, friend of her brother. lorence welcomes her, learns her ory, and dismisses the cowboy, ene Stewart. Next day Alfred mmond, Madeline's brother, kes Stewart to task. Madeline xonerates him of any wrong in- tant. Alfred, scion of a wealthy mily, had been dismissed from his home because of his dissipation. Madeline sees that the West has redeemed him. She meets Stillwell, Al's employer, typical western anchman. Stillwell tells her how Stewart beat up the sheriff to save her from arrest and then lit out for the border. Danny Mains, one of Stillwell's cowboys, has disappeared, with some of Stillwell's money. His friends link his name with the girl Bonita. Madeline gets a glimpse of life on a western anch. Stewart sends Madeline his orse Majesty. She buys out Still- well and "Her Majesty's Rancho" becomes famous. She finds her life work under "The Light of Western Stars." Learning Stewart had been hurt in a brawl at Chiricahua, Madeline visits him and persuades him to come to the ranch as the boss of her cowboys. Jim Nels, Nick Steele and "Monty" Price are Madeline's chief riders. They have a feud with Don Carlos' vaqueros, who are really guerrillas. Made- line makes Stewart promise that peace is kept. They raid Don Car- los' ranch for contraband arms.

—7—

"Senor Stewart, he keel my va- ero!" shouted Don Carlos, as, sweat- and spent, he concluded his ar- ignment of the cowboy. "Him you ust arrest! Senor Stewart a bad an! He keel my vaquero!"

"Do you hear thet?" yelled Hawe. The Don's got you figgered fer thet ittle job at El Cajon last fall."

The clamor burst into a roar. Hawe gan shaking his finger in Stewart's e and hoarsely shouting. Then a he young vaquero, swift as an In- an, glided under Hawe's uplifted rm. Whatever the action he intended, was too late for its execution. tewart lunged out, struck the va- ero, and knocked him off the porch. s he fell a dagger glittered in the nlight and rolled clinking over the tones. The man went down hard and id not move. With the same abrupt iolence, and a manner of contempt, tewart threw Hawe off the porch, hen Don Carlos, who, being less sup- le, fell heavily. Then the mob backed efore Stewart's rush until all were own in the courtyard.

The shuffling of feet ceased, the lanking of spurs, and the shouting. els and Monty, now re-enforced by Nick Steele, were as shadows of Stew- rt, so closely did they follow him. tewart waved them back and stepped own into the yard. He was absolute- y fearless; but what struck Madeline o keenly was his magnificent disdain. Manifestly, he knew the nature of the en with whom he was dealing. From he look of him it was natural for Madeline to expect them to give way efore him, which they did, even Hawe nd his attendants sullenly retreating.

Don Carlos got up to confront Stew- rt. The prostrate vaquero stirred nd moaned, but did not rise.

"You needn't jibber Spanish to me," aid Stewart. "You can talk Ameri- an, and you can understand Ameri-

"Senor Stewart, He Keel My Vaquero!" Shouted Don Carlos.

an. If you start a rough-house here you and your Greasers will be cleaned up. You've got to leave this ranch. You can have the stock, the packs and traps in the second corral. There's grub, too. Saddle up and hit the trail. Don Carlos, I'm dealing more than square with you. You're lying about these boxes of guns and catridges. You're breaking the laws of my coun- try, and you're doing it on property in my charge. If I let smuggling go on here I'd be implicated myself. Now you get off the range. If you don't I'll have the United States cavalry here in six hours, and you can gamble they'll get what my cowboys leave of you."

Don Carlos was either a capital ac- tor and gratefully relieved at Stew- art's leniency or else he was thorough- ly cowed by references to the troops.

"Si, Senor! Gracias, Senor!" he ex- claimed; and then, turning away, he called to his men. They hurried after him, while the fallen vaquero got to his feet with Stewart's help and stag- gered across the courtyard. In a mo- ment they were gone, leaving Hawe and his several comrades behind.

Hawe was spitefully ejecting a wad of tobacco from his mouth and swear- ing in an undertone about "white-liv- ered Greasers." He cocked his red eye speculatively at Stewart.

"Wal, I reckon as you're so hell-bent on doin' it up brown thet you'll try to fire me off'n the range, too?"

"If I ever do, Pat, you'll need to be carried off," replied Stewart. "Just now I'm politely inviting you and your deputy sheriffs to leave."

"We'll go; but we're comin' back one of these days, an' when we do we'll put you in irons."

"Hawe, if you've got it in that bad for me, come over here in the corral and let's fight it out. You've got it in for me, man to man. Speak up now and prove you're not the cowardly skunk I've always thought you. I've called your hand."

Muttering, cursing, pallid of face, Hawe climbed astride his horse. His comrades followed suit. Certain it ap- peared that the sheriff was contend- ing with more than fear and wrath. Savagely he spurred his horse, and as it snorted and leaped he turned in his saddle, shaking his fist. His comrades led the way, with their horses clatter- ing into a canter. They disappeared through the gate.

When, later in the day, Madeline and Florence, accompanied by Alfred and Stillwell, left Don Carlos' ranch it was not any too soon for Madeline. The inside of the Mexican's home was more unprepossessing and uncomfort- able than the outside. The halls were dark, the rooms huge, empty, and musty; and there was an air of silence and secrecy and mystery about them most fitting to the character Florence had bestowed upon the place.

On the other hand, Alfred's ranch- house, where the party halted to spend the night, was picturesquely located, small and cozy, camplike in the ar- rangement, and altogether agreeable to Madeline.

The day's long ride and the exciting events had wearied her. She rested while Florence and the two men got supper. During the meal it was not lost upon Madeline that Florence ap- peared unusually quiet and thoughtful. Madeline wondered a little at the cause. She remembered that Stewart had wanted to come with them, or de- tail a few cowboys to accompany them, but Alfred had laughed at the idea and would have none of it.

After supper Alfred monopolized the conversation by describing what he wanted to do to improve his home be- fore he and Florence were married.

Then at an early hour they all re- tired.

Madeline's deep slumbers were dis- turbed by a pounding upon the wall, and then by Florence's crying out in answer to a call.

"Get up! Throw some clothes on and come out!"

It was Alfred's voice.

"What's the matter?" asked Flor- ence, as she slipped out of bed.

"Alfred, is there anything wrong?" added Madeline, sitting up.

The room was dark as pitch, but a faint glow seemed to mark the posi- tion of the window.

"Oh, nothing much," replied Alfred. "Only Don Carlos' rancho going up in smoke."

"Fire!" cried Florence, sharply.

"You'll think so when you see it. Hurry out."

Florence helped Madeline to dress. Then they hurriedly stumbled over chairs, and, passing through the dining room, went out upon the porch.

Away to the westward, low down along the horizon, she saw leaping red flames and wind-swept columns of smoke.

Stillwell appeared greatly per- turbed.

"Al, I'm lookin' fer that ammunition to blow up," he said. "There was enough of it to blow the roof off the rancho."

"Bill, surely the cowboys would get that stuff out the first thing," replied Alfred, anxiously.

"I reckon so. But all the same, I'm worryin'. Mebbe there wasn't time. Supposin' thet powder went off as the boys was goin' fer it or carryin' it out! We'll know soon. If the explosion doesn't come quick now we can figger the boys got the boxes out."

For the next few moments there was a silence of sustained and painful sus- pense. Florence gripped Madeline's arm. Madeline felt a fullness in her throat and a rapid beating of her heart. Presently she was relieved with the others when Stillwell declared the danger of an explosion needed to be feared no longer.

"Sure you can gamble on Gene Stew- art," he added. "There! She's smol- derin' down now. Reckon we-all might jest as well turn in again. It's only three o'clock."

Madeline awakened early, but not so early as the others, who were up and had breakfast ready when she went into the dining room. Stillwell was not in an amiable frame of mind. The furrows of worry lined his broad brow and he continually glanced at his watch, and growled because the cow- boys were so late in riding over with the news. He gulped his breakfast, and while Madeline and the others ate theirs he tramped up and down the porch. Madeline noted that Alfred grew nervous and restless. Presently he left the table to join Stillwell out- side.

"They'll slope off to Don Carlos' rancho and leave us to ride home alone," observed Florence.

"Do you mind?" questioned Made- line.

"No, I don't exactly mind; we've got the fastest horses in this country; but I've no hankering for a situation Gene Stewart thinks—"

Florence began disconnectedly, and she ended evasively. Madeline did not press the point, although she had some sense of misgiving. Stillwell tramped in, shaking the floor with his huge boots; Alfred followed him, carrying a field-glass.

"Not a hoss in sight," complained Stillwell. "Somethin' wrong over Don Carlos' way. Miss Majesty, it'll be jest as well fer you an' Flo to hit the home trail. We can telephone over an' see that the boys know you're comin'."

Alfred, standing in the door, swept the gray valley with his field-glass.

"Bill, I see running stock-horses or cattle; I can't make out which. I guess we'd better rustle over there."

Both men hurried out, and while the horses were being brought up and sad- dled Madeline and Florence put away the breakfast dishes, then speedily donned spurs, sombreros and gaunt- lets.

"Here are the horses ready," called Alfred. "Flo, that black Mexican horse is a prince."

The girls went out in time to hear Stillwell's good-by as he mounted and spurred away. Alfred went through the motions of assisting Madeline and Florence to mount, which assistance they always flouted, and then he, too, swung up astride.

"I guess it's all right," he said, rather dubiously. "You really must not go over toward Don Carlos'. It's only a few miles home."

"Sure it's all right. We can ride, can't we?" retorted Florence. "I de- clare he and Al were sure rattled."

Florence dismounted and went into the house. She left the door open. Madeline had some difficulty in hold- ing Majesty. It struck Madeline that Florence stayed rather long indoors. Presently she came out with sober face and rather tight lips.

"I couldn't get anybody on the 'phone. No answer. I tried a dozen times."

"Why, Florence!" Madeline was more concerned by the girl's looks than by the information she imparted.

"The wire's been cut," said Flor- ence. Her gray glance swept swiftly after Alfred, who was now far out of earshot. "I don't like this a little bit. Heah's where I've got to 'figger,' as Bill says."

She pondered a moment, then hur- ried into the house, to return presently with the field-glass that Alfred had used. With this she took a survey of the valley, particularly in the direc- tion of Madeline's ranch-house. This was hidden by low, rolling ridges which were quite close by.

"Anyway, nobody in that direction can see us leave heah," she mused. "There's mesquite on the ridges. We've got cover long enough to save us till we can see what's ahead."

"Florence, what—what do you ex- pect?" asked Madeline, nervously.

"I don't know. There's never any telling about Greasers. I wish Bill and Al hadn't left us. Still, come to think of that, they couldn't help us much in case of a chase. We'd run right away from them. Besides, they'd shoot. I guess I'm as well satisfied that we've got the job of getting home on our own hands. We don't dare follow Al toward Don Carlos' ranch. We know there's trouble over there. So all that's left is to hit the trail for home. Come, let's ride. You stick like a Spanish needle to me."

A heavy growth of mesquite cov- ered the top of the first ridge, and the trail went through it. Florence appeared cautious, deliberate, yet she lost no time. She was ominously si- lent. Madeline's misgivings took defi- nite shape in the fear of vaqueros in ambush.

Upon the ascent of the third ridge, which Madeline remembered was the last uneven ground between the point she had reached and home, Florence exercised even more guarded care in advancing. Before she reached the top of this ridge she dismounted, looped her bridle round a dead snag, and, motioning Madeline to wait, she slipped ahead through the mesquite out of sight. Madeline waited, anxiously listening and watching. All of a sud- den she saw Majesty's ears were held up. Then Florence's face, now strange- ly white, showed round the turn of the trail.

"'S-s-s-sh!" whispered Florence, holding up a warning finger. She reached the black horse and petted him, evidently to still an uneasiness he manifested. "We're in for it," she went on. "A whole bunch of vaqueros hiding among the mesquite over the ridge! They've not seen or heard us yet. We'd better risk riding ahead, cut off the trail, and beat them to the ranch. Madeline, you're white as death! Don't faint now!"

"I shall not faint. But you frighten me. Is there danger? What shall we do?"

"There's danger. Madeline, I wouldn't deceive you," went on Flor- ence, in earnest whisper. We should—Al should have listened to Gene! I believe—I'm afraid Gene knew!"

"Knew what?" asked Madeline.

"Never mind now. Listen. We daren't take the back trail. We'll go on. I've a scheme to fool that grin- ning Don Carlos. Get down, Madeline—hurry!"

Madeline dismounted.

"Give me your white sweater. Take it off— And that white hat! Hurry, Madeline." She had divested herself of sombrero and jacket, which she held out to Madeline. "Heah. Take these. Give me yours. Then get up on the black. I'll ride Majesty. Rustle now, Madeline. This is no time to talk."

"But, dear, why—why do you want—? Ah! You're going to make the vaqueros take you for me!"

"You guessed it. Will you—"

"I shall not allow you to do any- thing of the kind," returned Madeline.

It was then that Florence's face, changing, took on the hard, stern sharpness so typical of a cowboy's. Madeline had caught glimpses of that expression in Alfred's face, and on Stewart's when he was silent, and on Stillwell's always. It was a look of iron and fire—unchangeable, unquench- able will. There was even much of violence in the swift action whereby Florence compelled Madeline to the change of apparel.

"Give Me Your White Sweater. Take It Off—and the White Hat; Hurry, Madeline."

"It'd been my idea, anyhow, if Stewart hadn't told me to do it," said Florence, her words as swift as her hands. "Don Carlos is after you—you, Miss Madeline Hammond! He wouldn't ambush a trail for any one else. He wants you for some reason. So Gene thought, and now I believe him. Well, we'll know for sure in five minutes. You ride the black; I'll ride Majesty. We'll slip around through the brush, out of sight and sound, till we can break out into the open. Then we'll split. You make straight for the ranch. I'll cut loose for the valley where Gene said positively the cowboys were with the cattle. The vaqueros will take me for you. They'll chase me. They'll never get anywhere near me. And you'll be on a fast horse. He can take you home ahead of any vaqueros. But you won't be chased. I'm staking all on that. Trust me, Madeline. If it were only my calculation, maybe I'd— It's because I remember Stewart. That cowboy knows things. Come, this heah's the safest and smartest way to fool Don Carlos." Madeline felt herself more forced than per- suaded into acquiescence. She mounted the black and took up the bridle. In another moment she was guiding her horse off the trail in the tracks of Majesty. Florence led off at right an- gles, threading a slow passage through the mesquite. She favored sandy patches and open aisles between the trees and was careful not to break a branch. Often she stopped to listen. This detour of perhaps half a mile brought Madeline to where she could see open ground, the ranch-house only a few miles off, and the cattle dotting the valley. She had not lost her cour- age, but it was certain that these fa- miliar sights somewhat lightened the pressure upon her breast. Excitement gripped her. The shrill whistle of a horse made both the black and Majesty jump. Florence quickened the gait down the slope. Soon Madeline saw the edge of the brush, the gray-bleached grass and level ground.

Florence waited at the opening be- tween the low trees. She gave Made- line a quick, bright glance.

"All over but the ride! That'll sure be easy. Bolt now and keep your nerve!"

When Florence wheeled the fiery roan and screamed in his ear Madeline seemed suddenly to grow lax and help- less. The big horse leaped into thun- dering action. Florence's hair streamed on the wind and shone gold in the sun- light. Then hoarse shouts unclamped Madeline's power of movement, and she spurred the black into the open.

He wanted to run and he was swift. Madeline loosened the reins—laid them loose upon his neck. His action was strange to her. He was hard to ride. But he was fast, and she cared for nothing else. She was running away from something; what that was she did not know. But she remembered Florence, and she wanted to look back. yet hated to do so for fear of the nameless danger Florence had men- tioned.

Madeline listened for the pounding of pursuing hoofs in her rear. Involuntarily she glanced back. On the mile or more of gray level between her and the ridge there was not a horse, a man, or anything living. She wheeled to look back on the other side, down the valley slope.

The sight of Florence riding Majesty in zigzag flight before a whole troop of vaqueros blanched Madeline's cheek and made her grip the pommel of her saddle in terror. That strange gait of her roan was not his wonderful stride. Could Majesty be running wild? It flashed over Madeline that Florence was putting the horse to some such awkward flight as might have been expected of an eastern girl frightened out of her wits. Madeline made sure of this when, after looking again, she saw that Florence, in spite of the horse's breaking gait and the irregular course, was drawing slowly and surely down the valley.

Madeline had not lost her head to the extent of forgetting her own mount and the nature of the ground in front. When, presently, she turned again to watch Florence, uncertainty ceased in her mind. The strange fea- tures of that race between girl and vaqueros were no longer in evidence. Majesty was in his beautiful, wonder- ful stride, low down along the ground, stretching, with his nose level and straight for the valley. Between him and the lean horses in pursuit lay an ever-increasing space. He was running away from the vaqueros. Florence was indeed "riding the wind," as Stewart had aptly expressed his idea of flight upon the fleet roan.

A dimness came over Madeline's eyes, and it was not all owing to the sting of the wind. She rubbed it away, seeing Florence as a flying dot in a strange blur. What a daring, intrepid girl! This kind of strength—and aye, splendid thought for a weaker sister— was what the West inculcated in a woman.

The next time Madeline looked back Florence was far ahead of her pur- suers and going out of sight behind a low knoll. Assured of Florence's safe- ty, Madeline put her mind to her own ride and the possibilities awaiting at the ranch. She remembered the fail- ure to get any of her servants or cow- boys on the telephone. To be sure, a windstorm had once broken the wire. But she had little real hope of such being the case in this instance. She rode on, pulling the black as she neared the ranch.

It was perhaps fortunate for her, she thought, that the climb up the slope cut the black's speed so she could manage him. He was not very hard to stop. The moment she dismounted, however, he jumped and trotted off. At the edge of the slope, facing the corrals, he halted to lift his head and shoot up his ears. Then he let out a piercing whistle and dashed down the lane.

Madeline, prepared by that warning whistle, tried to fortify herself for a new and unexpected situation; but as she espied an unfamiliar company of horsemen rapidly riding down a hollow leading from the foothills she felt the return of fears gripping at her like cold hands, and she fled precipitously into the house.

CHAPTER XI

A Band of Guerrillas.

Madeline bolted the door, and, flying into the kitchen, she told the scared servants to shut themselves in. Then she ran to her own rooms. It was only a matter of a few moments for her to close and bar the heavy shutters, yet even as she was fastening the last one in the room she used as an office a clattering roar of hoofs seemed to swell up to the front of the house. She caught a glimpse of wild, shaggy horses and ragged, dusty men. She had never seen any vaqueros that re- sembled these horsemen. Vaqueros had grace and style; they were fond of lace and glitter and fringe; they dressed their horses in silvered trap- pings. But the riders now trampling into the driveway were uncouth, lean, savage. They were guerrillas, a band of the raiders who had been harassing the border since the beginning of the revolution. A second glimpse assured Madeline that they were not all Mex- icans.

The presence of outlaws in that band brought home to Madeline her real danger. She remembered what Stillwell had told her about recent out- law raids along the Rio Grande. These flying bands, operating under the ex- citement of the revolution, appeared here and there, everywhere, in remote places, and were gone as quickly as they came. Mostly they wanted mon- ey and arms, but they would steal any- thing, and unprotected women had suf- fered at their hands.

Madeline, hurriedly collecting her securities and the considerable money she had in her desk, ran out, closed and locked the door, crossed the patio to the opposite side of the house, and, entering again, went down a long cor- ridor, trying to decide which of the many unused rooms would be best to hide in. And before she made up her mind she came to the last room. Just then a battering on door or window in the direction of the kitchen and shrill screams from the servant women in- creased Madeline's alarm.

"A rude, powerful hand clapped round her waist and swung her aloft."

GREATER RESPECT FOR LAW

Legion Probation Plan Saves Many De- troit Ex-Service Men From Stigma of Prison Terms.

Judge Thomas M. Cotter of the Re- corder's court of Detroit, Mich., act- ing on suggestion of the American Le- gion, has successfully put into opera- tion a probation plan, which has in- stilled in the minds of many former service men a high regard for the au- thority of the law.

The system was suggested in 1919, following discharge from military serv- ice of many thousands of men, of whom some were forced to appear in police court on minor charges of mis- demeanors. Under the plan inaugu- rated many of these men were spared the stigma of a prison sentence, due to a far-sighted policy instigated by Judge Cotter.

Only the word of the man himself, with a promise to be a better citizen, and the word from some American Le- gion official is necessary to save the man from sentence. The plan works remarkably well, according to the reports of the court. Out of 847 former service men who appeared before Judge Cotter, only six or seven re- appeared in his court to answer charges for violation of the statutes.

The plan has been adopted in every police court in the city of Detroit.

At the time of the instigation of the probation system Detroit was filled with bolshevistic propaganda, and the success of the Legion system indicates the turning point of many former sol- diers from disregard of law and order to a high respect for the law's au- thority.

FROM CONVICT TO COLONELCY

American Legion Acts to Obtain Par- don for Man Who Made Record in British Army.

Kenneth F. Thomas had been con- victed and was serving a term in a Virginia penitentiary on a charge of bigamy at the time of the outbreak of the World war. While employed in one of the prison farm projects he escaped, made his way up to Canada, where he enlisted and was soon in active service.

He established a splendid war rec- ord, reaching a colonelcy before dis- charge. During this time he kept the Virginia authorities informed of his movements, and promised that he would return and serve out his term as soon as the war was over.

Recently the man returned to Rich- mond and declared that he was ready to complete his prison term, admitting his identity, and acknowledging his war record. Delay in return, it is said, was due to the fact that for two years he has been in a hospital recov- ering from the effect of wounds.

His splendid record for bravery and attention to duty won high esteem of the British army officials. The Amer- ican Legion has taken up the fight to obtain pardon or parole for the man, and the case has been presented to the governor of Virginia by interested Legionnaires.

Roy M. Hancock Among Missing.

Diligent search is being made for Roy M. Hancock, formerly a private in the Motor Transport Corps of the army, a World war veteran. Mrs. Hat- tie Hancock of Chattanooga, Tenn., waited in vain for word from her son following the war. Government of- ficials had him classified as a deserter. Early in April Mrs. Hancock received word from the state hospital for the insane at Fort Sam Houston, Texas, that her son was a patient in that in- stitution. On the heels of this infor- mation came word that he had escaped and no trace has been found of him since that time. Hancock is twenty- eight, five feet nine inches in height, dark hair, and has a horseshoe tat- tooed on his right arm below his el- bow. In the emblem are the words "Good Luck." Following the govern- ment's discovery that the man was a mental patient and not a deserter, he was given an honorable discharge.

Donation of Memorial.

Officials of the Illinois department of the American Legion, state officials and prominent Chicagoans gathered recent- ly at Cicero, a suburb of Chicago, for the unveiling of a monument to the soldier dead of the city. The monu- ment was given by a Cicero real es- tate dealer and bears the names on bronze plates of those Cicero men who made the supreme sacrifice. Dedica- tory exercises were under the direc- tion of the Legion.

THE KLEMME TIMES

Twenty-seventh Year—Number 44. Klemme, Iowa, Thursday Afternoon, July 12, 1923. $1.50 In Advance—$2.00 Outside of County

VALUABLE INFORMATION FROM IOWA STATE COLLEGE

GRAIN FARMING ON PAY BASIS

That grain farmers in the cash grain districts of Iowa farmed profitably, on the average, last year, is demonstrated by figures secured in a survey of 207 representative Calhoun county farms conducted by agricultural economists from Iowa State College. No figures were secured in this particular study on livestock farming.

The average labor earnings of the 207 farms was $1,200. Since this is somewhat more than farm wages, it may truely be said that these farmers made a profit, declares C. C. Taylor, of the agricultural economics and farm management department of the college.

The highest labor earnings made by any one farmer was $3,931 and the greatest loss was $2,303. Only six farmers failed to have something to show for their labor and management. Thirty farmers made more than $2,000 and 30 made an account less than $500.

These figures were secured by trained enumerators. who visited personally each of the farms covered in the survey. They obtained from each of the 207 farmers a record of his business for the year ending March 1, 1923.

PICKLING ON INSTALLMENT PLAN

Produce of Small Garden Can Be Utilized as it Matures

A method of canning pickles on the installment plan, so that the produce of the small garden can be fully utilized, is reccommended by Miss Beth Bailey of the home economics division of Iowa State College.

A cup each of salt, sugar and must ard are mixed with a half gallon of vinegar and a half gallon of water. The pickles can be put into thismixture a few a day until the crock is full. In a week to 10 days the pickes will be ready to eat. Prepared in this way they will keep all winter.

If quart jars are used, a tablespoon full of each of the ingredients with a pint of vinegar and a pint of water will give the proper mixture.

ERADICATE ANTS WITH POISON

Carbon Bisulfide is Reccommended by Landscape Archetect

There are two waps of getting rid of ants which infest lawns, says E. J. Piester of the landscape architecture departmnt of the Iowa State College.

One method is to give the lawn a series of three good soakings of an hour or so at intervals of three days and roll it following the watering with a 500 pound roller.

The better way, in Mr .Piester's opinion is to poison the ants. Small holes are made near the ant hill into which with the aid of a funnel one teaspoon full of bisulfide of carbon is poured. One should close the hole immediately after by stepping down on it with the heel. This method should be attempted only on days when there is no wind. The Car bon biaulfide will kill grass if spilled upon it.

Corn silage and alfalfa hay are the best ruffages for diary cattle while corn fodder and timothy have been proved the poorest.

The people of Iowa consume 80 percent of theh oney produced in the state.

Enlargement of the brood sow's thyroid gland has been found to be the cause of hairless pigs.

DOES AN EDUCATION PAY?

In discussing this most important subject. the Houstan Chronicle points out that it is the only thing in life that does pay, and gives the following excellent advice:

"Schools and colleges do not educate men, they merely make it possible and convenient for men to educate themselves.

"Men have become educated without ever entering a school, or a college, and men have gone through all kinds of schools and colleges making the grades, pasing the examinations, receiving the diplomas and degrees without becoming educated.

Let this fact speak for itself. Let it sink in deep. I is the big outstanding fact in history, and it means much.

"The school, or college, is opportunity; that, and no more. It is not a mill to grind out perfected human beings. o convert ne'er-do-wells into Solomons, but it is the door, the practical, common sense way, to enter a field of learning.

"One can learn all that a school or college offers on the outside, but it will be harded, much harder, and it discourages 999 out of every thousand.

"One can go to school or college, and get nothing, but that, too is exceptional.

"The school and college are here, not because education is barred to the few without them. but because it would be barred to many.

" They are here as a matter of pratical, economic time saving, as an inspiration for which there is no substitute, as a priveledge for the masses.

"As to those singular men who win sucess without education be careful how you rate them.

"Unlearned and unlettered they may be in the formal sense, but not in the essential sense, and besides whatever they may have achieved for themselves, they owe much to those around them, and before them who worked with the tools of education.

"Henry Ford, for instance. does he run his factories and erect his gigantic machines?

"Did he perfect the progress of refining metal, without which the auto mobile would be impossible, or the battery or the sparkplug.

"No, indeed, he merely added an idea, a thought there, but the bulk of it drew from educated men, not only in this generation, but in past generatios.

"He has made millions, while Milton, Socrates and Moses made nothing. while Columbus died in chains, but which of them all is most successful?

.."What is this success that every boy or girl worries about?

"Is is so much money to spend on peasure, so much more income for luxury, so much social climbing bp which to lord it over one's neighbors or is it made of finer stuff, of that substance we call service that the world remembers with gratitude?

"Don't confuse education with for mal knowledge, or sucess with the dollar, though both a necessary part of conventionalized society.

'Put education and sucess on this basis—first, to become healthy, helpful human beings; second to become good citizens; third, to become useful workers in the field of trade and profession; then question of whether education pays or whether it insures sucess, becomes easier to answer."

THEY NEED THE KLEMME BAND ASK 'EM TO PLAY LOUDER

A number of Belmond people have complained that the Garner band, furnishing the Belmond band concert, does not play loud enough. They say the music cannotbe heard a block away. There is something to this complaint. The Garner band is a good one, giving high class music, but what's the use if it can't be heard? "A little louder, please."—Belmond Independent.

The situation in America is improving gradually. Fewer people now say "You tell 'em".

IOWA SOIL IS WORTH 425 BILLION

Four hundred twenty-five billion dollars!

This figure 18 times greater than the total debt of the United Saes, is the market value today of plant food materials in Iowa soils to a depth of 40 inches.

Surface soil alone, the upper seven inches, is worth in plant food $86,785,841,165.

These figures which include the cost of the three chief plant food elements, nitrogen, phosphorus and pot assium, are based on extensive study made by Dr. P. E. Brown. of the farm crops and soils department of Iowa State College, of the amount of plant food in the soil.

He has found that in Iowa the average amount of nitrogen to the acre considering the seven inches surface is 4,515 pounds; of phosphorus, 1,390 pounds, and of potassium, 29, 709 pounds.

On the basis of the price of three element if they were bought in the form of commercial fertilizer, the nitrogen in an acre would be worth $903, the phosphorus $208.50 and the potassium $1,485.43. The value of all three in an acre would be $2,596.95. By multiplying this amount by the total acreage of farms in Ia. 33,418,372, Dr. Brown got the total value of the food elements in the state.

When he considered the top 40inches of soil, Dr. Brown found that the total food in an acre is worth $12,725.80. At this rate if the plant food should be suddenly removed from the top 40 inches of all Iowa land, the state would be poorer by exactly $425,275.518,397.

A lot of folks know a lot more than they are willing to admit, while a lot more are willing to admit that they know a lot more than they do.

THREE BUSINESS PLACES ROBBED HERE SUNDAY MORNING

PLOW WORKS WITHOUT DRIVER

That farmers may before many years past be able to turn an automatic plow loose in a field in the evening go to bed and awake in the morning to find the field plowed is a possibility born out by tests with such a plow which have been conducted at Iowa State College.

The automatic plow works without tractor or horses and after it is set going does not need a man to run it. In tests at the college, the plow which is still in process of being perfected has worked with considerabe sucess.

It has been developed along lines suggested by J. B. Davidson, head of the agricultural engineering department by D. B. Lucas graduate student in agricultural engineering.

Two plow bottoms, one left hand and one right hand, are placed on opposite sides of the main axle, about which the entire outfit is balanced

The power is furnished by a small gasoline engine mounted above the main axle. One of the drive wheels follows the furrow and thus guides the plow.

A long bar across the top of the machine and extending slightly beyond each plow bottom reverses the direction of the plow when it comes in contact with the fence at the end of the field. Another device makes it possible for the machine to move the width of the furrow toward the land side when the direction has been changed.

Both Mr. Davidson and Mr. Lucas are confident that it can be made to work efficiently and at a grea saving of labor, since after it is set going it will not require the presence of a driver. While such a machine would meet with difficulity in stumpy, stony or extremely rough land. there are hundreds of thousand of acres in Iowa where it would be possible to use it.

AIR PLANES TO BE AS COMMON AS AUTOS

Major Eddie Rickenbacker, famous ace, got up the other morning in Mt. Clemens, Mich., ate his breakfast went to his office and opened his morning mail. At 9:45 a. m. he went to a flying field and boarded his plane, "Spark Plug." In an hour and fifty minutes he was shaking hands with Akron, Ohio, officals at Stow Field, 150 miles away from his starting point. And that's what will be happening daily in the United States in a few years, Rickenbacker remarked casually, as he prepared for a speech a few hours later.

"The day is not far away when every city of size will own its own municipal flying field, "he continued. In twenty-five years planes will drop down and take gas and undergo repair just as autos do now and will be the leading means of travel. An airplane can go anywhere there is atmosphere."

LEDYARD BOY HAS TERRIBLE ACCIDENT

Bancroft Register:—Sam Stamm young son of Mr. and Mrs William Stamm, of Ledyard, suffered a peculiar ad painful accident Sunday forenoon when a tine of a fish spear was driven through his hand. He had been out to the river with his father and was returning home when the accident happened. The spear was tied to the side of the car and the boy had his head leaning on his hand. The rope near the front of the car which was holding the spear became untied allowing the handle to drop to the ground and as the car was being driven at a fair rate of speed, the spear was thrushed back with terrrible force. One of the middle tines of the spear penetrated the boy's hand between the third and fourth fingers and was driven up through the bone, coming out near the back of the wrist. The handle of the spear was broken. Owing to the barb on the tine it was impossible to pull it from the hand and here was over half of he long handle still with the tines. He was taken to town as quickly as possible where the tine that impaled the hand was sawed off with a hack saw. It was not thought advisable to attempt to remove the tine until it could be done by a physician so he was driven to Lakota where the tine was removed. The tines of the spear just missed his head by a fraction of an inch and while the accident was a horrible one it might easily have been much more serious.

BURGLARS GET GOOD SIZED LOOT IN EARLY MORNING JOB

Frightened Away After Third Job by Klemme Men

The town was wide awake with excitement Sunday morning at about two o'clock when it was learned that burglars were working. and three business places had been visited and robbed.

The first job the burglar or burglars was at the Northern Lumber Company office. They gained entrance through a side window and made their way into the office where the safe was opened and cash and checks removed. The safe was not locked, or perhaps the combination was on the day lock as it was not broken to get the loot. The robothers got away with only about 15 dollars in cash, the rest being in checks and of no value to them.

The next job that was pulled was at the Wellemeyer Department Store.. The thieves gained entrance through a rear window leading into the flour storage room from which place they could easily enter any part of the store. The safe, which was on the second floor was blown open and the contents taken. amounting to about $150 in cash and about $350 in checks and securities They made a slick job of it at Wellemeyers as they blew the safe door into thousands of pieces without ruining any other part of th safe. They also rifled all cash drawers in various parts of the store and took everything but pennies. When the safe was blown it was heard by a number of persons nearby and on the street but it sounded like a fire cracker and little was thought of he noise.

A about this time Lee Ridder and Art Kuck had returned from a ride and and had just put Lee's car in the garage in the alley back of Kluckhohn's store an were standing outside the Ridder garage talking when they heard glass breaking in rear of Kluckhohn's store, then another crash of glass and they stepped around the corner and saw someone enter with a flashlight. Lee husted into the office to get a revolver in the desk, but could only find one shell and so intended to load a rifle but at that time Kuck signalled that the thief was coming out and by the time Lee was out they could see him in the alley back of Bachman's barber shop and heard him throw something over the fence. Lee took shot at him, but it went wild, they called a him to stop bu he ran full speed down he alley in a ziz-zag course, cut across Henry Lewis poulry store yard and over toward the tracks. The boys chased him that for and then came back as they did not like the ide of getting shot at. Soon after the business part of town was wide awake and business men were investigating to see if there was any furthur loss.

The aricles the thief threw over the fence were later found to be a small wrecking bar, a heavy pipe-wrench and a hammar. These tools were taken from Wellemeyer's store

The sheriff was notified and soon appeared on the scene and took foot prints and finger prints and secured other clews.

Evidence is being gathered and it is possible that the party who pulled the job Sunday morning may be apprehended.

POINCARE WINS DEPUTIES' VOTE

Deadlock With Britain Over Policy in Ruhr Valley Is Emphasized.

FRENCH ENCIRCLE FRANKFORT

Ready to Raid Rail Centers and Cut Off Bavaria From the North—Brussels Issues Ultimatum to Berlin.

Paris, July 7.—Nothing could better emphasize the deadlock which the British and French have reached in the London conversations than Premier Poincare's repeated insistence during a debate in the chamber of deputies of the papal letter to Cardinal Gasparri that "no power, temporal or spiritual, can turn us from pursuing the strict application of the Versailles treaty."

He added, "France, which already has advanced 100,000,000,000 francs for the devastated regions, will regret she must make certain large financial consortiums wait awhile longer."

In this stand the French premier received a vote of confidence of 388 to 186. As in the senate debate on this occasion which led to unanimous voting of credits for the Ruhr occupation, M. Poincare tried to defend France's prestige at the vatican by showing that the pope, after conferring with Ambassador Jonnart, had not only pointed out that the letter was not meant as a direct attack upon France, but it contained recognition that Germany had not been a faithful debtor, and that the holy see had given formal instructions to its nuncio in Germany to protest against sabotage in the Ruhr, which had caused the death of Belgian and French soldiers.

Frankfort, July 7.—The French have pushed their army up to the edge of Frankfort, so as to be ready to seize it at a moment's notice. Frankfort is second only to Berlin as a German railway center, and occupation of it would enable France to send troops speedily to cut off Bavaria from northern Germany.

Brussels, July 7.—The Belgian diplomatic agent at Berlin has informed the German government that diplomatic relations will be suspended if the reich does not repudiate unequivocally the Ruhr "crimes." The French ambassador has given similar notice.

U. S. Demands Its Part of Seized Turkish Funds

Lausanne, July 5.—Joseph C. Grew, unofficial observer at the Near East peace conference, called upon General Pelle, the French delegate, Sir Horace Rumbold of Great Britain, and Signor Montagna of Italy and announced that America considered itself entitled to a share of the 5,000,000 Turkish gold pounds ($25,000,000) seized by the allies in Constantinople after the signing of the Mudros armistice in 1918.

Dismiss Indictment Against Illinois Lieutenant Governor

Springfield, Ill., July 3.—States Attorney C. F. Mortimer nolled the indictment against Lieut. Gov. Fred E. Sterling of Rockford, charging him with conspiracy to misappropriate state funds. Sterling was indicted with Governor Small and Vernon Curtis of Grant Park. The case against the governor was tried at Waukegan and he was found not guilty.

Russia Adopts Constitution Similar to That of U. S.

Moscow, July 5.—The new federal constitution of Russia, unanimously approved by the all-Russian central executive committee, is modeled after the Constitution of the United States. Like the latter it contains nothing about freedom of speech or the press, which in America formed the subject of later amendments. It is stated that such will be the case in Russia when circumstances permit.

Playwright Robert C. Scott Found Dead; Called Suicide

Los Angeles, Cal., July 5.—Robert Crozier Scott, playwright and scenario writer, was found dead in his room, his throat having been cut. The police pronounced it suicide and said they found papers showing Scott's wife had filed suit for divorce.

President Harding Speaks at Fourth of July Gathering

Portland, Ore., July 5.—President Harding, speaking at an Independence day gathering here, said the nation should demand that every man wearing the habiliments of an American citizen must be an American citizen in his heart and soul.

Doctor May Give Unlimited Rum.

Helena, Mont., July 7.—Congress, having conferred upon physicians the discretionary right of prescribing liquor, cannot regulate the amount a physician may prescribe, Federal District Judge Bourquin held in a decision.

Nova Scotia Challenges Strikers.

Sydney Mines, N. S., July 7.—Addressing a mass meeting of striking coal miners, Mayor Nicholson declared that the strikers' tactics constituted a challenge of the government, and the government accepted a finish fight.

MRS. CHARLES H. SABIN

Mrs. Charles H. Sabin has been designated as the New York member of the newly created women's advisory committee of the Republican national committee, in accordance with the plan approved by President Harding for giving women definite positions of authority in the Republican organization. Mrs. Sabin is known to be a staunch supporter of President Harding and an advocate of the world court. She is also president of the National Women's Republican club and vice chairman of the Republican organization of Suffolk county.

One Week's Loading in June Breaks All Records.

Passes the Million Car Mark—Miscellaneous Merchandise Heads List With 581,244 Cars—Other Loadings Exceed Expectations.

Washington, July 5.—That business is booming along to still higher levels of activity is indicated by the shattering of all records for the transportation of freight.

For the third consecutive week and the fourth time this year, loading of revenue freight exceeded the million mark for the week which ended on June 23, the total for the week being 1,022,740 cars. Freight loading so far this year has been the heaviest in history.

The total for the week of June 23 was an increase of 136,419 cars over the corresponding week last year, and an increase of 227,293 cars over the corresponding week in 1921. It also exceeded by a wide margin the corresponding weeks in 1918, 1919, and 1920.

The total for the week of June 23 this year, for the country as a whole, was 13.6 per cent over the corresponding week last year. Freight loading in the western districts alone was an increase of only 8.5 per cent compared with the same week last year.

Loading of merchandise and miscellaneous freight amounted to 581,244 cars. Loading of grain and grain products totaled 33,958 cars.

Live stock loadings totaled 29,251 cars. Forest products loading amounted to 78,068 cars. Ore loading continued very heavy, the total for the week being 82,041 cars.

SHORTER STEEL DAY PREDICTED

Iron Institute Directors Favor Making Change When Conditions Warrant.

LABOR SURPLUS IS AWAITED

President Harding's Correspondence With Leaders of the Industry Is Made Public as Executive Sails for Alaska.

Tacoma, Wash., July 6.—Before sailing on the Henderson for Alaska President Harding made public correspondence between himself and the directors of the American Iron & Steel institute concerning the President's request for abolition of the twelve-hour day in the steel industry.

"The large majority of the steel manufacturers of America have undertaken to abolish the twelve-hour day in the American steel industry at the earliest moment that the additional labor required shall be available," the President said in his statement.

The correspondence followed a report made by the Iron and Steel institute on its investigation of the twelve-hour day in the industry. The institute at that time declared that conditions prevented immediate abolition of the twelve-hour day.

On June 18 the President wrote to Elbert H. Gary, a director of the institute. The institute's reply was signed by Mr. Gary and the following directors: John A. Topping, W. A. Robers, W. H. Donner, W. J. Filbert, E. A. S. Clark, James A. Farrell, E. G. Grace, Willis L. King, James A. Burden, L. E. Black, Severn E. Kerr, J. A. Campbell, A. C. Dinkey and Charles M. Schwab.

"Careful consideration has been given to your letter of June 18 by the undersigned directors of the American Iron and Steel institute, comprising all of those whose attendance could be secured at this time," wrote the directors.

"Undoubtedly there is a strong sentiment throughout the country in favor of eliminating the twelve-hour day, and this we do not underestimate. On account of this sentiment, and especially because it is in accordance with your own expressed views, we are determined to exert every effort at our command.

"This means the employment of large numbers of workmen on an eight-hour basis and all others on a basis of ten hours or less. Without an unjustifiable interruption to operations the change cannot be effected overnight. It will involve many adjustments, some of them complicated and difficult, but we think it can be brought about without undue delay, if, as you state it, 'there is a surplus of labor available.'"

Prominent People

Commends Forestry Methods of France

Charles Lathrop Pack, president of the American Tree association, who has been sending millions of young trees to France to help reforest the devastated battle areas, commends to Americans the methods of the French as told in a report received by the association. He says the operations in the forest of Roentgen near Aix la Chapelle and in the forest near Cleves are conducted along the most scientific lines.

"We find," says Mr. Pack, "that the French and the Belgians have cut something like four million board feet with the coming growth fully in mind.

"This is much different from the slashing and girdling done by the Germans during the war in their retreat. In this French method there is a great lesson for the United States. With France there are always more trees coming.

"In the United States there are millions of acres of idle land once covered with growing trees. They could be that way today had scientific forestry been practiced in this country during the last forty years. There should be a forest crop in this country just as there are other kinds of crops.

"Our idle land was not made idle by an invading army with cannon, but an invading army with axes. But we are in much the same situation as France, although from different causes. The thing to do now is to reforest these idle acres, for our newspapers and our factories must have forest products 'f. o. b. the warehouse door.'"

Hungarian Invents Far-Seeing Machine

The telehor, the machine which sees at great distances, is the invention of Denes Mihaly, twenty-nine years of age, the chief engineer of the Budapest telephone works and head of several other mechanical organizations. Mihaly, a well-known student of high frequency electrical currents, has no less than 62 inventions on the market, including the speaking kinematograph, a new system of colored kinematograph, a plastical kinematograph, and many automobile and wireless inventions.

The telehor is made of two separate instruments, the receiver and the reproducer. The connection of the two instruments may be effected either through a wire, wire connection or wireless. Every photograph, landscape, figure, handwriting or any object which is placed before the objective of the receiver is seen under less than 1-10 of a second on the screen of the reproducer. The principle of the telehor is similar to that of the photo-machine of Professor Korn. The latter, however, makes necessary an ordinary photo proceeding.

With the telehor it is a question of transferring moving pictures, similar to those which appear in an ordinary camera. Every time the objective is opened, the electro-light transformer is effected in the telehor, also, with a selenium cell which changes the different light elements of the picture to similar electro-light currents in the instrument. The obstacle to effecting this up to now has been in the nature of the selenium, which acted very slowly so that the cell was ineffective. The solution of the problem was made possible in the telehor with the invention of an exceedingly small selenium cell, which is capable of registering 100,000 light changes per second.

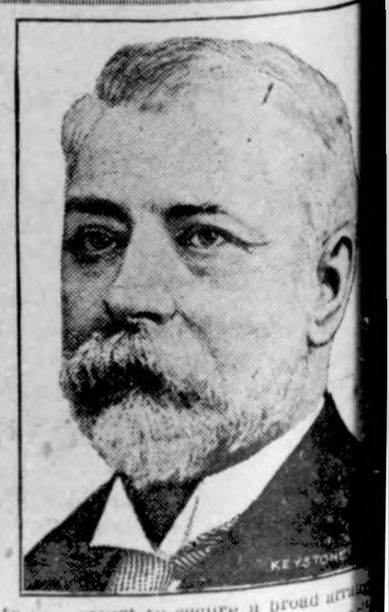
Horace Towner Has Ungrateful Job

Only a little while ago Horace M. Towner, former congressman from Iowa, was appointed by the President to be the governor of Porto Rico, to succeed E. Mont Reily. Scarcely had he assumed his new duties than he found himself confronted with an opposition as determined as that which had succeeded in having Reily ousted from the position.

Governor Towner is charged with ignoring the Republican party, which Governor Reily favored in his appointments, and with turning virtually all offices over to Unionists, the dominant party of the island, whose appeal to Washington brought the change in administration.

President Harding probably will be carried into the whirlwind of Porto Rican politics when he visits San Juan after his trip to Alaska. Reports to Secretary Weeks show continued friction. He considers it virtually impossible to name an executive who will please both factions. The secretary denies Governor Towner has ignored the Republicans completely. Pleas for the removal of Towner are expected when Mr. Harding reaches the island.

Canadian Favors Reciprocity With U. S.



Back in 1911 Hon. W. S. Fielding of Canada negotiated with President Taft for a treaty of reciprocity between the United States and Canada. It failed because eastern Canada opposed it. Mr. Fielding is now finance minister, and recently he made another trip to Washington to revive the proposition. It is said in Ottawa his plan will have the support of a large majority in the new Canadian parliament. The farmers of the western provinces have increased their voting strength, and the Liberals stand with them on this proposition.

The Fielding proposal, made in the house of commons at Ottawa, is that President Harding reduce by 50 per cent the duties on cattle, wheat, flour, oats, barley, potatoes, onions, turnips, hay and fish. The Canadian government would then be authorized "to make such reductions of duties on similar articles imported into Canada from the United States." Preliminary to any effort to secure a broad arrangement which would call for the ratification of congress and the Canadian parliament, efforts will be directed to that action which the President is already empowered by congress to take under the Fordney-McCumber tariff.

MANY NEW LAWS IN EFFECT JULY 4TH

Truck Bill Probably Most Important

A number of the laws enacted by the Fourtieth general assembly became effective July 4th. Among those noteworthy are the famed and defamed Truck bill. the anti-mask bil, motor carrier license law, a liquor law, statuary requirement of women representatives on the political party committees, a limitation on bonds law, a law allowing the state reduction of the period of crim inal case may be brought to the supreme court, and compulsory flag observance.

The Truck bill requires county officers to limit county expenditures to the actual revenue of the county for that year in the several funds; affixes a severe penality for the violation of the statute.

The anti-mask bill, a replica of the Tenessee law invoked to curb the klan, makes it a misdemeanor to disturb the peace while wearing a mask, or disguise, the penality for infraction being ten to twnety years.

LAKE VIEW PARK IS POPULAR PLACE

Lake View Park, which is on the east shore of West Twin Lakes, is becoming a very popular place this year. Several families have pitched camps there for the summer mon ths, hundreds of visitors from the surrounding country visit there there during each week and in addition to these, many tourists from this and other states stop at this little beauty spot for a day of two of rest and recreation before passing on.

Sunday afternoons large crowds gather there and are usually entertained by a ball game, while others enjoy the day picnicing, fishing, boating and bathing.

People whom we have talked to feel that Lake View is one of the finest small pleasure parks in this section of the state, and the increasing number that gather there every week is evidence of the truthfullness of this statement.

It is rumored that a gentleman from Clear Lake will launch number of fishing bots and one passenger boat in the near future and if this materializes the park will become more popular than ever.

PLAN STRONGER FORCE TO FIGHT WET SMUGGLERS

Government Expects to Build Up Powerful Fleet of Revenue Cutters

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11,—New plans for a more vigorous cam paign to supress smugglers of liquorh, narcotics and aliens through an enlarged coast guard service. were outlined by government officials today.

Since a scheme to employ the army and navy for this purpose has been abondoned, the government has decided to concentrate its efforts hereafter in a more powerful fleet or revenue cutters.

Dry leaders in congress are being lined up behind a program for great ly increased appropriations for the coast guard. Other angles of the plan call for more funds and also for the immigration and customs services.

The tentative program for building up the coast guard provides for the placing into commission of larger numbers of smaller but speedier vessels. Hundreds of motor boats and launches are said to be badly needed to prevent smugglers landing with their contraband At present they escape detection because of inadequae patrol forces.

GIVE THE BEST THAT'S IN YOU —MAN

Don't give just a little to the man who hires you, give him the fullest in your power.

Don' hold back some of the good that is in you, but put your full shoulder to the wheel in order that he may see that pou are giivng back 100 per cent.

Don't be afraid to do a little more than you are paid for, for in that lies the plane upon which the pard-stick measures your success.

Don't hesitate to do the thing that is hard and perhaps now disagreeable, in order that the easier things may come to you, and the more agreeable tasks may be your lot in later life.

Don't hide the real truth from yourself— you are not doing your best if you only do half.

Don't think that you will succeed, or that you will ever emulate the great men of our ime if you go plodding along with half a heart, and half a will to do the jobs that are to be done.

This is sound advice my friends, and if you follow it with common sense you are bound to get along. — Job Faces in Union News.

RECOGNIZING LIEF ERICSON

The Scandinavians in the United States are planning the anual observace of the anniversary of Lief Ericson's discovery of America in the year1000. The belief that Ericson's discovery was nothing more than a Scandinavian legend is now generally discredited. Historians believe that Ericson reached the mainland of North America on an expedition directed toward Greenland. It is possible that additional research will bring complete proof that Ericson, and not Columbus. was the first old world discoverer to find the new word.

This is no reason, however for minimizing the importance of Columbus discovery. The new world owed it colonization and it real beginnings of white civilization to the voyoges of Columbus. If Columbus had not come across the ocean, and if the spirit of his. time had not prompted his search for new lands, America's colonization might have been delayed for several hundred years even though Ericson and the early Norseman were aware of the existence of a new land here.

KU KLUX KLAN BURNS CROSS AT KANAWHA

Kanawha has a Klan organization. At least a burning cross, the insigni of the order, was blazing forth it's firey message last Thursday night between 10:30 and 11:30 oc'lok, on the public school grounds. No Klan literature was found at or near the burning cross and some are of the opinion that its burning was but a hoax whie others are firm in the belief that Kanawha has an actice orgnization.

The cross was made of wood wrapped with cotton and then bound with silk and cloth. It was about six feet high.

The Klan organization is fast becoming national in its scope, while many object to the mask, yet there must be good features to cover come this drawback, as new organizations are springing up every day thruout the states.

If Kanawha has a Klan organization we hope nd trust that they will at least rid the counrp of he "hootch venders" who are dragging our young men into the mire.—Reporter

NEW THISTLE INVADES IOWA

Is Kin to Canada Thistle, Says Dr. L. H. Pammel.

A new form of the Canada thistle is a weed that is beginning to spread into Iowa and that offers a serious threat to Iowa farming unless farmers are on the lookout for it and eradicate it as it puts in an appearance. says Dr. L. H. Pammel, head of the botany department of Iowa State College, who hs toured many parts of the state in the last few weeks.

The leaves of this plant are not so spiny as those of the Canada Thistle, but the flowers are of the same color and the heads are of about the same size. It is a deep rooted perennial Clean cultivation, especially in July, August and September, is the best method, Dr. Pammel says, of keeping the weed down.

The wooly thistle is another weed against which Dr. Pammel warns Iowa farmers. The leaces and stem are very wooly and the head is about the same size as the common field thistle. It is also a perennial. It was oroginaly native in western Iowa, but it is now common in the pastures of the Central and Northern parts of Iowa.

THE UNIVERSAL CAR

The Four Door Sedan

The new Four Door Sedan is proving a most popular car and is filling a long felt want in giving the four door feature on a Ford Car.

The body of the Four Door Sedan is approximately three inches longer than the two door type Sedan; the extra length providing additional leg room for occupant of the rear seat.

The body panels are all aluminum, and there are no wood parts exposed on the body. This gives a stronger, lighter body, insures a uniform finish and prevents the paint from checking.

The heighth of the new four Door Sedan is one inch less than the two door type; it has a straight roof line which adds greatly to the appearance.

EQUIPMENT

The new Four Door Sedan has beautiful, durable upholstery. Comes equiped with leather Storm Visor or sun shade; Tire Carrier, Spare Rim; Dome Light; Cowl Ventilator; the handles on doos are the straight bar type, black rubber with nickel trimmings and all doors are equiped with locks. The doors are wide—front 23 1-2 inches and the rear doors are 24 inches. The windshield is adjustable, the windows are operated with crank; interior fittings are finished in oxidized silver. The cushons are deep and wde—the front seat cushon being divided so driver does not leave seat when filling gas tank.

Would any of r people, her friends, ever believe ? Could she tell it? She remem- ed the ghoulish visages of those arved rebels, and marveled at her ssed fortune in escaping them. Stewart's arrival in the glade, the urage with which he had faced the shaved men, grew as real to her now the iron arm that clasped her. Had been an instinct which had impor- ned her to save this man when he y ill and hopeless in the shack at Chiricahua? In helping him had she dged round her forces that had just erated to save her life, or if not that, more than life was to her? She believed so.

A heavy languor, like a blanket, began to steal upon her. She wavered and drifted. With the last half-conscious sense of a muffled throb at her ear, a something intangibly sweet, deep-toned, and strange, like a distant calling bell, she fell asleep with her head on Stewart's breast.

CHAPTER XII

Friends From the East.

Three days after her return to the ranch Madeline could not discover any physical discomfort as a reminder of her adventurous experiences. If it had not been for the quiet and persistent guardianship of her cowboys she might almost have forgotten Don Carlos and the raiders. Madeline was assured of the splendid physical fitness to which this ranch life had developed her, and that she was assimilating something of the Western disregard of danger. A hard ride, an accident, a day in the sun and dust, an adventure with outlaws—these might once have been matters of large import, but now for Madeline they were in order with all the rest of her changed life.

There was never a day that something interesting was not brought to her notice. Stillwell, who had ceaselessly reproached himself for riding away the morning Madeline was captured, grew more like an anxious parent than a faithful superintendent. He was never at ease regarding her unless he was near the ranch or had left Stewart there, or else Nels and Nick Steele. Naturally, he trusted more to Stewart than to any one else.

"Miss Majesty, it's sure amazin' strange about Gene," said the old cattleman, as he tramped into Madeline's office.

"What's the matter now?" she inquired.

"Wal, Gene has rustled off into the mountains again. He's sneaked off an' Nels, who was down to the lower trail, saw him meet somebody that looked like Padre Marcos. Wal, I went down to the church, and, sure enough, Padre Marcos is gone. What do you think of that, Miss Majesty?

"Maybe Stewart is getting religious," laughed Madeline. "Let him take his mysterious trips into the mountains. Here, Stillwell, I have news for you that may give you reason for worry. I have letters from home. And my sister, with a party of friends, is coming out to visit me. They are society folk, and one of them is an English lord. Let me read you a few extracts from my mail."

Madeline took up her sister's letter with a strange sensation of how easily sight of a crested monogram and scent of delicately perfumed paper could recall the brilliant life she had given up. She scanned the pages of beautiful handwriting. Helen seldom wrote letters, and she never read anything, not even popular novels of the day. She was as absolutely ignorant of the West as the Englishman, who, she said, expected to hunt buffalo and fight Indians. Moreover, there was a satiric note in the letter that Madeline did not like, and which roused her spirit.

When she finished reading aloud a few paragraphs the old cattleman snorted and his face grew redder.

"Did your sister write that?" he asked. "Does she think we're a lot of wild men from Borneo?"

"Evidently she does. I rather think she is in for a surprise. Now, Stillwell, you are clever and you can see the situation. I want my guests to enjoy their stay here, but I do not want that to be at the expense of the feelings of all of us, or even any one. Helen will bring a lively crowd. They'll crave excitement—the unusual. Let us see that they are not disappointed. You take the boys into your confidence. Tell them what to expect, and tell them how to meet it. I shall help you in that. I want the boys to be on dress-parade when they are off duty. I want them to be on their most elegant behavior. I do not care what they do, what measures they take to protect themselves, what tricks they contrive, so long as they do not overstep the limit of kindness and courtesy. I want them to play their parts seriously, naturally, as if they had lived no other way. My guests expect to have fun. Let us meet them with fun. Now what do you say?"

Stillwell rose, his great bulk towering, his huge face beaming.

"Wal, I say it's the most amazin' fine idee I ever heerd in my life."

"Indeed, I am glad you like it," went on Madeline. "Come to me again, Stillwell, after you have spoken to the boys. But, now that I have suggested it, I am a little afraid. You know what cowboy fun is. Perhaps—"

"Don't you go back on that idee," interrupted Stillwell. He was assuring and bland, but his hurry to convince Madeline betrayed him. "Leave the boys to me. Why, don't they all swear by you, same as the Mexicans do to the Virgin? They won't disgrace you, Miss Majesty. They'll be simply immense. It'll beat any show you ever seen."

"I believe it will," replied Madeline. "Very well, we will consider it settled. My guests will arrive on May ninth. Meanwhile let us get Her Majesty's Rancho in shape for this invasion."

* * * * * * *

On the afternoon of the ninth of May, perhaps half an hour after Madeline had received a telephone message from Link Stevens announcing the arrival of her guests at El Cajon, Florence called her out upon the porch. Stillwell was there with his face wrinkled by his wonderful smile and his eagle eyes riveted upon the distant valley. Far away, perhaps twenty miles, a thin streak of white dust rose from the valley floor and slanted skyward.

"Look!" said Florence, excitedly.

"What is that?" asked Madeline.

"Link Stevens and the automobile!"

"Oh no! Why, it's only a few minutes since he telephoned saying the party had just arrived."

"Take a look with the glasses," said Florence.

One glance through the powerful binoculars convinced Madeline that Florence was right. And another glance at Stillwell told her that he was speechless with delight. "Wal, as Nels says, I wouldn't be in that there ottomobile right now for a million pesos," he remarked.

"Why? Is Stevens driving fast?"

"Good Lord! Fast? Miss Majesty, there hain't ever been anythin' except a streak of lightnin' run so fast in this country. I reckon I'd like to be hyar when Link drives up, but I want to be with the boys down by the bunks. It'll be some fun to see Nels an' Monty when Link comes flyin' along."

"I wish Al had stayed to meet them," said Madeline.

Her brother had rather hurried a shipment of cattle to California; and it was Madeline's supposition that he had welcomed the opportunity to absent himself from the ranch.

"I am sorry he wouldn't stay," replied Florence. "But Al's all business now. And he's doing finely. It's just as well, perhaps."

"Surely. That was my pride speaking. I would like to have all my family and all my old friends see what a man Al has become. Well, Link Stevens is running like the wind. The car will be here before we know it. Florence, we've only a few moments to dress. But first I want to order many and various and exceedingly cold refreshments for that approaching party."

Less than a half-hour later Madeline went again to the porch and found Florence there.

"Oh, you look just lovely!" exclaimed Florence, impulsively, as she gazed wide-eyed up at Madeline. "And somehow so different!"

Madeline smiled a little sadly. Perhaps when she had put on that exquisite white gown something had come to her of the manner which befitted the wearing of it. She could not resist the desire to look fair once more in the eyes of these hypercritical friends. The sad smile had been for the days that were gone. For she knew that what society had once been pleased to call her beauty had trebled since it had last been seen in a drawing-room. Madeline wore no jewels, but at her waist she had pinned two great crimson roses. Against the dead white they had the life and fire and redness of the desert.

"Link's hit the old round-up trail," said Florence, "and oh, isn't he riding that car!"

With Florence, as with most of the cowboys, the car was never driven, but ridden.

A white spot with a long trail of dust showed low down in the valley. It was now headed almost straight for the ranch. Madeline watched it growing larger moment by moment, and her pleasurable emotion grew accordingly. Then the rapid beat of a horse's hoofs caused her to turn.

Stewart was riding in on his black horse. He had been absent on an important mission, and his duty had taken him to the international boundary line. His presence home long before he was expected was particularly gratifying to Madeline, for it meant that his mission had been brought to a successful issue. Once more, for the hundredth time, the man's reliability struck Madeline. He was a doer of things.

Madeline advanced to the porch steps. And Stewart, after taking a parcel of papers from a saddle-bag, turned toward her.

"Stewart, you are the best of couriers," she said. "I am pleased."

Dust streamed from his sombrero as he doffed it. His dark face seemed to rise as he straightened weary shoulders.

"Here are the reports, Miss Hammond," he replied.

As he looked up to see her standing there, dressed to receive her eastern guests, he checked his advance with a violent action which recalled to Madeline the one he had made on the night she had met him, when she disclosed her identity. A man struck by a bullet might have had an instant jerk of muscular control such as convulsed Stewart. In that instant, as her keen gaze searched his dust-caked face, she met the full, free look of his eyes. Her own did not fall, though she felt a warmth steal to her cheeks. Madeline very seldom blushed. And now, conscious of her sudden color, a genuine blush flamed on her face. It was irritating because it was incomprehensible. She received the papers from Stewart and thanked him. He bowed, then led the black down the path toward the corrals.

Madeline watched the weary horse and rider limp down the path. What had made her thoughtful? Mostly it was something new or sudden or inexplicable that stirred her mind to quick analysis. In this instance the thing that had struck Madeline was Stewart's glance. He had looked at her, and the old burning, inscrutable fire, the darkness, had left his eyes. Suddenly they had been beautiful. The look had not been one of surprise or admiration; nor had it been one of love. She was familiar, too familiar with all three. It had not been a gaze of passion, for there was nothing beautiful in that. Madeline pondered. And presently she realized that Stewart's eyes had expressed a strange joy of pride. That expression Madeline had never before encountered in the look of any man. Probably its strangeness had made her notice it and accounted for her blushing. The longer she lived among these outdoor men the more they surprised her. Particularly, how incomprehensible was this cowboy Stewart! Why should he have pride or joy at sight of her?

The approaching automobile was on the slope now, some miles down the long gradual slant. Its velocity was astounding. Long, gray veils, like pennants, streamed in the wind. A low rushing sound became perceptible, and it grew louder, became a roar. The car shot like an arrow past the alfalfa field, by the bunk-houses, where the cowboys waved and cheered. The horses and burros in the corrals began to snort and tramp and race in fright. At the base of the long slope of the foothill Link cut the speed more than half. Yet the car roared up, rolling the dust, flying capes and veils and ulsters, and crashed and cracked to a halt in the yard before the porch.

Madeline descried a gray, disheveled mass of humanity packed inside the car. Besides the driver there were seven occupants, and for a moment they appeared to be coming to life, moving and exclaiming under the veils and wraps and dust-shields.

Link Stevens stepped out and, removing helmet and goggles, coolly looked at his watch.

"An hour an' a quarter, Miss Hammond," he said. "It's sixty-three miles by the valley road, an' you know there's a couple of bad hills. I reckon we made fair time, considerin' you wanted me to drive slow an' safe."

From the mass of dusty-veiled humanity in the car came low exclamations and plaintive feminine wails.

Madeline stepped to the front of the porch. Then the deep voices of men and softer voices of women united in one glad outburst, as much a thanksgiving as a greeting, "Majesty!"

* * * * * * *

Helen Hammond was three years younger than Madeline, and a slender, pretty girl. Having recovered her breath soon after Madeline took her to her room, she began to talk.

"Majesty, old girl, I'm here; but you can bet I would never have gotten here if I had known about that ride from the railroad. You never wrote that you had a car. I thought this was out West—stage-coach, and all that sort of thing. Such a tremendous car! And the road! What kind of a chauffeur is he?"

"He's a cowboy. He was crippled by falling under his horse, so I had him instructed to run the car. He can drive, don't you think?"

"Drive? Good gracious! He scared us to death, except Castleton. Nothing could scare that cold-blooded little Englishman. I am dizzy yet. Do you know, Majesty, I was delighted when I saw the car. Then your cowboy driver met us at the platform. What a queer-looking individual! He had a big pistol strapped to those leather trousers. That made me nervous. When he piled us all in with our grips, he put me in the seat beside him, whether I liked it or not. I was fool enough to tell him I loved to travel fast. What do you think he said? Well, he eyed me in a rather cool and speculative way and said, with a smile, 'Miss, I reckon anything you love an' want bad will be coming to you out here!' I didn't know whether it was delightful candor or impudence. Then he said to all of us: 'Shore you had better wrap up in the veils an' dusters. It's a long, slow, hot, dusty ride to the ranch, an' Miss Hammond's order was to drive safe.' He got our baggage checks and gave them to a man with a huge wagon and a four-horse team. Then he cranked the car, jumped in, wrapped his arms round the wheel, and sank down low in his seat. There was a crack, a jerk, a kind of flash around us, and that dirty little town was somewhere on the map behind. For about five minutes I had a lovely time. Then the wind began to tear me to pieces. I couldn't hear anything but the rush of wind and roar of the car. I could see only straight ahead. What a road! I never saw a road in my life till today. Miles and miles and miles ahead, with not even a post or tree. That big car seemed to leap at the miles. It hummed and sang. I was fascinated, then terrified. We went so fast I couldn't catch my breath. The wind went through me, and I expected to be disrobed by it any minute. I was afraid I couldn't hold any clothes on. Presently all I could see was a flashing gray wall with a white line in the middle. Then my eyes blurred. My face burned. My ears grew full of a hundred thousand howling devils. I was about ready to die when the car stopped. I looked and looked, and when I could see, there you stood!"

"Helen, I thought you were fond of speeding," said Madeline, with a laugh.

"I was. But I assure you I never before was in a fast car; I never met a driver."

"Perhaps I may have a few surprises for you out here in the wild and woolly West."

Helen's dark eyes showed a sister's memory of possibilities.

"You've started well," she said. "I am simply stunned. I expected to find you old and dowdy. Majesty, you're the handsomest thing I ever laid eyes on. You're so splendid and strong, and your skin is like white gold. What's happened to you? What's changed you? This beautiful room, those glorious roses out there, the cool, dark sweetness of this wonderful house! I know you, Majesty, and, though you never wrote it, I believe you have made a home out here. That's the most stunning surprise of all. Come, confess. I know I've always been selfish and not much of a sister; but if you are happy out here I am glad. You were not happy at home. Tell me about yourself and about Alfred. Then I shall give you all the messages and news from the East."

It afforded Madeline exceeding pleasure to have from one and all of her guests varied encomiums of her beautiful home, and a real and warm interest in what promised to be a delightful and memorable visit.

Of them all Castleton was the only one who failed to show surprise. He greeted her precisely as he had when he had last seen her in London. Madeline, rather to her astonishment, found meeting him again pleasurable. She discovered she liked this imperturbable Englishman. Manifestly her capacity for liking any one had immeasurably enlarged. Quite unexpectedly her old girlish love for her younger sister sprang into life, and with it interest in these half-forgotten friends, and a warm regard for Edith Wayne, a chum of college days.

"There's a gang of bandits riding on the ranch!"

THORNTON FRIEND OF LEGION

Head of Canadian Railway System, Long in Army Service, Strong for Organization.

A Canadian by adoption, but formerly a citizen of the United States, Sir Henry Thornton, head of the great Canadian national railway system, shows his respect for American World war fighters on every occasion.

When members of the American Legion in Canada gathered to pay tribute to the honored World war dead of the nation, Sir Henry was the principal speaker, taking this opportunity to demonstrate his regard for the heroes of the land of his birth. The event was attended not only by American Legion members, but representatives of nearly every allied nation.

One of the best-known men in the Dominion of Canada, Sir Henry is heartily co-operating with the attempt of the American Legion to organize the veterans of the United States now in Canada into posts of the American Legion. A recent reorganization of the Legion in the Dominion has caused the inauguration of such a campaign.

Sir Henry was born in Logansport, Ind., in 1871. His early education was received at St. Paul's, Concord, N. H., and he later entered the University of Pennsylvania. Here he received a degree from the civil engineering department of the school in 1894, and almost immediately obtained employment with the Pennsylvania Railway company as a draughtsman. He held various important positions with the engineering department of this company and in 1911 became general superintendent of the Long Island railway, a subsidiary line of the Pennsylvania. In this capacity he had much to do with the development of the Long Island terminal and with the electrification of the Long Island railroad.

In April, 1914, he was called to England to become general manager of the Great Eastern railway. This railway was one of the most important military lines of communication during the war. In 1916 Mr. Thornton was named deputy director of inland water transportation, with the rank of colonel in the Royal Engineers. This department handled all inland water navigation in northern France, Egypt and Mesopotamia. He rose to the rank of major general, and was named inspector general of transportation in 1918. Following his acceptance of British naturalization in 1919, he was gazetted a knight commander of the Order of the British Empire. He has been awarded the American Distinguished Service Medal, the Order of Leopold from the Belgians, and the Legion of Honor from the French.

Call from Canada for Sir Henry's services came in November, 1922, when he was asked to go to the Dominion to the Canadian National Railway system as chairman of the board of directors and president of the company.

AIM TO TEACH PATRIOTISM

Several New Laws, Approved by American Legion, Passed by West Virginia Legislature.

Before any person can become a teacher in West Virginia schools, he or she must take an oath of allegiance to support the Constitution of the United States and the state of West Virginia. This is the text of a bill passed recently by the West Virginia legislature, as one of three measures sponsored by the American Legion, all of which have become statutes of the state.

The bill requiring the oath of allegiance is one of the ideas for carrying out plans for thorough Americanization put forward by the Legion and given strength by the support of the veterans' organization.

Another bill requires that the United States flag shall be flown over every schoolhouse in the state while schools are in session, except in inclement weather. The bill further provides that the flag, a regulation United States standard, shall be purchased by the school board from the building fund.

The third bill which received the support of the Legion calls for thorough training in the schools of the state in history of the United States, civics, and instruction in the constitutions of the nation and of the state. This bill was presented with the idea that thus would the principles of Americanism, the perpetuation of the ideals of the nation, and knowledge of the organization of the government become known to every student in the state.

teen Firemen Quit Positions At Special Meeting

W FIRE COMPANY IN FORCE

The old Volunteer Fire Department of Klemme is a thing of the t and ancient history so far as old members are concerned.

At a special meeting a week ago Monday the members of the com., fifteen in number, signed renations and handed it to the wn Council.

Their action might seem sudden the average citizen but dissatistion has been brewing for some e and dates back about two rs. At that time the fire comy wanted new equipment and a emical fire fighting device was omised by the council providing fire company would raise part the money; the council to pay the lance. Through a lot of hard rk the company put on a min-el show and made some money, d they saved up $100 toward the w equippment. After some de- the council investigated the fire hting devices but they were still y high in price so the buying was t off until better prices could be tained. When the new council s elected and organized the fire mpany again submitted the proition as some of the old members re still on the board. After two nths or more of investigation and cing the council finally brought proposition to a vote and the tion carried favorably and the mmittee of councilmen authorized buy a new Ford truck. two chemi- tanks and all necessary equipnt for a complete chemical out-

There was much rejoicing with fire company. They would pay 00 towards the outfit and keep up payments on the chemical tanks that all it would cost the town the price of a new truck.

Then the news began to leak out at the council had a new bug in ir bonnet and they have thus far gotten to purchase the outfit.

The fire company called a special eeting and called off the whole rks and quit.

Thus ended the squabble, and of rse there are faults on both sides the fire company could not see it y other way, and the council did t see all the other way, so there u are and the boys said they uld all quit and end the fussing.

NEW TRUCK LAW

A new law has just gone into effect that will mean a great deal to truck drivers and those driving any motor vehicles for hire. Any truck that is used for hire except grocery or other delivery wagons used within the city limits or trucks for hauling farm produce. There is now a special tax on such, and the drivers must make a report to railroad commisioners who in turn report to the county treasurer who distributes this fund among the primary, secondary and township road funds in proportion to where the driving was done. A driver must keep a schedule of each mile traveled, and those making regular trips must report if they are laid off, giving reasons for getting laid off, or they will be charged with the full tax for such days. The intention of this law as we understand was to hit buss and truck drivers for a tax to help pay for improving highways to be used by others who start indirect competion with them. The law no doubt just, but it will make a lot of work to keep proper records and collect and distribute these funds.—Garner Signal.

FAR NORTH HEARS IOWA'S CORN SONG

KETCHIKAN, ALASKA.,— The Iowa Corn song, most popular of any piece of music played at the recent Shrine convention in Washington, D. C. has been introduced by President Harding's party in almost every state traversed since it left Washington and today was carried into this Alaskian city for the first time by some of the singing members of the presidential grouq. It was applauded by people of Ketchikan who heard it and probably it will be passed along the Alaskian trails to the far north.

On the evening of the first day abroad the naval transport Henderson, en route from Tacoma, Wash., to Alaska, the United States navay band. temporoly stationed on the Hendrson was requesed to play "The Iowa Corn Song." The bandmaster was unable to comply. He had not the music nor had he heard the song and there was gloom aplenty for the timebeing. But he was not long unprepared. At the concert on the following morning the thirty musicans had the music before them and have not failed to play the air at any succeeding concert.

This is how the music was written and the orchestration of it made possible. Bandmaster Charles Benter heard bursts of song rising from one of the cabins that night. His attention was caught by the words "Iowa." Soon he had some of his improvisors about him and all were listening outside the door. Then below decks they went and began playing, putting what they heard of the song into notes of their various instruments. When the other musicians appeared in the morning each was handed his part of the song and the request of the evening was automatically discharged. Little details like playing the chorus again and again with total absence of verses—in the same manner as the musicans had heard the cabin serenaders—made no difference to the presidents' party's applause which was thundered out when the band concluded its first playing of "The Iowa Corn Song."

SOME RULES FOR AVOIDING FIRES

Ashes, whether inside or otuside the house, should be placed in metal receptacles. Rags or cloths used in oiling floors or polishing furniture often ignite spontaneously; they should be restored in metal containers or else burned after using. If kerosene lamps are used keep them clean and filled, for those allowed to burn with little oil in them are ikely to explode. Hanging electric light cords on nails or hooks is almost certain in time to destroy or injure the insulation; this condition may cause a fire. Kerosene should not be used to enliven a fire, nor poured into a range or furnace even when a fire is started. An electric light bulb used for warming beds or for drying clothes is almost certain to start a fire.

AMERICA AND HOME OWNERS

Some years ago the British govern ment sent a commission to the United States to study indusrial condiions here. The commission viiting all parts of the country and in its report remarked, among other things, the large proportion of the laboring people here own their homes. Now comes a woman, Mrs. Edith Elmer Wood, of New Jersey, aand declares that the United States does less than any other nation to encourage home owning. Well, the government at least makes the people prosperous, or opens the way to prosperity, as an encouragement to home owning.—New Castel (Ind.) Courier.

BURNING CROSS VIEWED HERE SATURDAY NIGHT

A TELEPHONE NATION

In 1877 the number of telephones per hundred population in both the United States and Europe was none.

In 1899 the United States had less than one telephone per hundred population while Europe had barely a fraction of a telephone. In 1921 Europe had a little better than one telephone per hundred population while the United States had rizen to more than thirteen telephones per hundred population and now has a total of 14,500,000 in use, which is about two-thirds of all the telephones in the whole world.

In this country there is about one telephone to every two farm dwellings, a convenience unheard of in other countries. This wonderful telephone developement is due to efficient organization, to the comulative effect and importance of investments great and small in all the apparatus and equipment requireed for the transmission of speech, as well as to the foresight and business acumen of those who have directed the policy of the Bell system from the beginning. and to the fact that in this country telephone developement has been left to private enterprise under reasonable government regulation.

THOUSANDS ALREADY WAIT TO PASS IMMIGRANT GATES

The steamships of American, English, French, Italian, Dutch lines are sailing for New York with full cargoes in the steerage.

Along the Canadian line thousands of immigrants are waiting for July 1. So in Cuba, and Mexico. The year will close June 30. Upon July 1 the new year begins during which time United States will receive immigrants from all nations in number three per cent of the various nationals in this country by the census of 1910.

The quota was filled during the last year for practically all nations. There were, in fact, more Italians returning, but the returns do not count in the calculations made at Ellis Island. The desire to get in is greater than ever. The rush is performing not only at the port of New York. but at all other gates opening on the sea and on the land.

It is a condition unprecedented. If the gates were opened we shoudl receive immigrants in number greater than we have ever had them before, and we have received a million a year. We should never again open the gates to all who want to come. The demands of industry for unskilled labor will not balance tere public demand that we shall take care not to admit more than we can absorb into our own citizenship mould to understanding and appreciation of their obligations as well as their opportunities. But we have not found the exact answer to the question which this exodus from Europe raises. We must find a method of selection and distribution which will not make quota day a day for jamming the doors, for dividing families. for sending back thousands who have sold all their possessions in the expectation that they were to get a new home in this country.

INSURANCE GROWING CHEAPER

Not long ago the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that electricity was the only large item in the cost of living which had shown any reduction in cost to the consumer since 1917.

Whether or not this indicates a recognition of the truth that he expense for fire insurance represents only a small percentage of the individual overhead is not made clear, or whether it was merely an oversight of the Bureau in overlooking this bulwark of modern society. it is matter of record. however, that between 1912 and 1922, the average rate charged in the United States for fire insurance coverage declined to the extent of 7 cents for each $100 of insurance carried.

The astounishing feature of this situation is the fact the reduction took place in the face of heavy advances for railroad rates, rents, supplies, wges, advertising and other necessary expenses.

KLU KLUX KLAN APPEARED IN KLEMME SATURDAY NIGHT

Many See Burning Cross On Hill West Of Town

Did the Klu Klux Klan visit this city Saturday night, is the question which ran in the minds of a large crowd as they witnessed the burning of a cross on the hill just at the west end of Main Street Saturday night between ten and eleven o'clock which was plainly visable for a great distance.

The burning cross is the emblem of the Klu Klux Klan and is a warning sign to all who violate the law. Perhaps the burning cross was the final warning that robbing and petty thieving must stop in Klemme.

Some are inclined to think it was the work of some jokers as there was no literature found near the cross as is usually the case where the Klan makes its appearance.

Others think seriously of the matter and believe that there are Klansmen in this vicinity.

It caused quite a bit of excitement here and we venture that there were some who felt weak in the knees when they witnessed the burning cross on the hill.

Like demonstrations have occured recently at Britt and Kanawha, and also at other towns.

It was rumored about that white robed figures were seen to leave in a car shortly after the cross was first seen, but we have not been able to trace this rumor down to the person who actually saw the Klansmen.

However, let it be a warning to evil doers as the Kan stands for the observance of law and order and 100 per cent Americanism.

PAPA CAN SPANK GIRLS UNTIL THEY REACH 21 YEARS

New Law Raises Legal Age of Women in State.

Girls—here is good news for you. Papa now has the right to spank you until you reach 21 years. But he must also feed clothe and take care of you until you reach that age.

A law went into effect July 4 raising the legal age of girls from 18 to that of men, 21 years. It was passed by the 40th assembly.

If, however the girl became 18 before July 4 th then she is her own mistress and neithr papa nor any one else has the right to spank her or tell her whether she can bob her hair But her friend who crossed the 18 mark on July 5 or after will not grow up for three more years.

The new provisions are contained in Chapter 198, Section 1, of the Acts of the 40 th general assembly. It states however that the raising of the legal age does not affect contracts for marriage which can be made by girls more than 18 years.—Globe Gazette.

CANNING FACTORY FOR BELMOND

A big canning factory company in Minnesota is reported to be looking for a likely location for a branch canning plant and it is said has in mind Belmond as a fine location for such a plant. The company has one or two other branches in Iowa and is engaged in canning a variety of vegetables from peas tomatoes, and pickles to corn. Such a plant here would be a fine addition to Belond's industries and if there is any thing behind the rumor it should be encouraged.—Belmond Independent

FRENCH SEIZE 3 MORE CITIES

Elberfeld, Barmen and Limburg Are Occupied by the Invaders.

TAKE REICHSBANK MANAGER

Police Officials and Funds Also Seized in Reprisal for An Act of Violence —Italy Sides With Great Britain.

Dusseldorf, July 14.—French troops have occupied Elberfeld, Barmen and Limburg. The first two cities are on the edge of the Ruhr region. Limburg is just beyond the Coblenz bridgehead.

Leaving Hasslinghaussen, the troops proceeded to Marmen, where they occupied the public buildings and the railway station. The manager of the local reichsbank and a number of police officials were taken as hostages by the French, who also seized a fund of 8,000,000,000 marks.

Although they have separate governments, Elberfeld and Barmen are practically one town. They are situated on the Wupper, on the southern edge of the Ruhr district. For five miles they stretch along the river.

Each of the towns has a population of approximately 170,000. Industries form the principal economic basis. There are paper mills, chemical and iron works and textile plants.

The seizure of Elberfeld and Barmen is attributed by the French to an act of violence by fifteen of the German security police. According to this story, two French soldiers, who were tracking some German smugglers, were surrounded by the police, who seized and disarmed them and took them to Elberfeld. Finally their weapons, now unloaded, were returned to them, and they were escorted to the edge of the occupied area.

A report of this incident resulted in the prompt issuance of orders for the seizure of the two industrial towns.

Rome, July 14.—Italian officials today declared that Prime Minister Baldwin's statement in the House of Commons closely accords with the Italian policy. It is predicted that Italy will assent to the main provisions of the note which Britain will submit to her allies as a reply to the last reparations note from Germany.

Premier Baldwin is praised for his efforts to obtain unity among the Allies. Italy hopes that the United States will be represented on the proposed international commission of reparations experts, which is expected to link the reparations question with the problem of the interallied debts.

Atlantic City Is Kopenik to 1923 Cobbler-Doctor

Atlantic City, N. J.—July 14.—Though he never studied surgery and has no degree, Russell George, twenty-eight, Toronto, now under arrest here for robbery, hoodwinked physicians of the Atlantic City hospital so successfully that he was invited to become "resident physician and surgeon" and actually held the post from March 1 to May 21 without exciting suspicion.

"It was too easy," said George. "I never said I had any diploma, and was never asked for any."

Find Calendar Stone of Mongol Period in Mexico

Mexico City, July 14.—Prof. William Niven, American explorer, this week unearthed a calendar stone several thousand years older than the famous Aztec calendar stone found at San Miguel Amantha, near this city. The stone belonged to the Mongoloid civilization, proving that the Aztecs inherited part of their culture from the civilization of the early Mongols who lived in Mexico from seven to ten thousand years ago.

Twelve Hundred Homeless as Two Towns in Idaho Burn

Wallace, Idaho, July 14.—Damage fixed by county officials at $1,500,000 has been done by a fire that sprang up in a residence in the town of Mace, Idaho, and, fanned by a breeze that blew up the narrow Burke canyon for three-quarters of a mile, destroyed Mace and the business district of Burke, another neighboring town. Twelve hundred persons, it is estimated, have been rendered homeless.

Polish Cathedral Robbery Nets Bandits $8,000,000

Warsaw, July 14.—Bandits broke into the oldest Polish cathedral at Genzen and robbed it of priceless relics and golden articles, including a head of St. Albertus, patron of Poland. The total losses exceed $8,000,000.

FRENCH ARE DEFIANT

Warn Britain Upon Proposed New Ruhr Deal.

Poincare Declares the Nation Will Not Tolerate International Reparations Board on Basis Suggested by Secretary Hughes.

Paris, July 12.—France issued a warning to Great Britain and the rest of the world that she will tolerate no attempt to settle the German reparation question through any other agency than the reparation commission.

The warning, issued in an interview by a high foreign office official, followed definite word that Prime Minister Baldwin, in his speech in the house of commons will accept Germany's proposal that the allies accede to Secretary Hughes' suggestion that reparations be fixed by an international commission of economic experts.

Inasmuch as semi-official advices indicate that the United States will join Britain in her new policy, the French warning must be regarded as directed in part at the United States.

"France insists on her legal rights," said the foreign office official, who had been delegated by Premier Poincare to give the interview. "Under the Versailles treaty, the reparation commission and no one else, has authority over reparations. If any other nation or nations sets up any other agency to usurp the reparation commission's authority, France will take measures to prevent the effectiveness of such action.

"There is no question that the British action means a break between Britain and France. Then what becomes of the League of Nations? For the basis of the league is allied solidarity, and if there is no solidarity the league must fade away."

RAIL STRIKES ARE OUTLAWED

Federal Court Injunction Against Shopmen's Union Is Made Permanent.

400,000 MEMBERS AFFECTED

Judge Wilkerson Calls Primary Purpose of Strike Unlawful—Daugherty Says No Tieup Will Ever Again Halt Trains.

Chicago, July 13.—The Daugherty injunction—the most sweeping and drastic restraining order ever issued by an American court—under the terms of which members of the striking shop crafts' union were temporarily enjoined last October in the Federal district court here from interfering in any way with the operation of the railroads of the nation, was made permanent by a final decree of Judge James H. Wilkerson.

By this order 400,000 member-workers of the Federated Shop Crafts, their officers and other affiliated bodies of the American Federation of Labor, their servants, agents and employees are stopped for all time from hindering or obstructing railroads engaged in interstate commerce; from conspiring, confederating or arranging to injure the railroads, and from loitering or unnecessarily being in the vicinity of railroads.

In Washington Attorney General Daugherty gave out a statement saying the injunction meant that "no extensive strike tying up interstate commerce will ever again take place in this country. The law in this regard is now forever settled."

Judge Wilkerson issued the order for a permanent injunction after reviewing a mass of evidence, represented by 181 exhibits comprising 250 affidavits submitted on and after Sept. 12, 1922, in support of the effort to make the restrainer permanent.

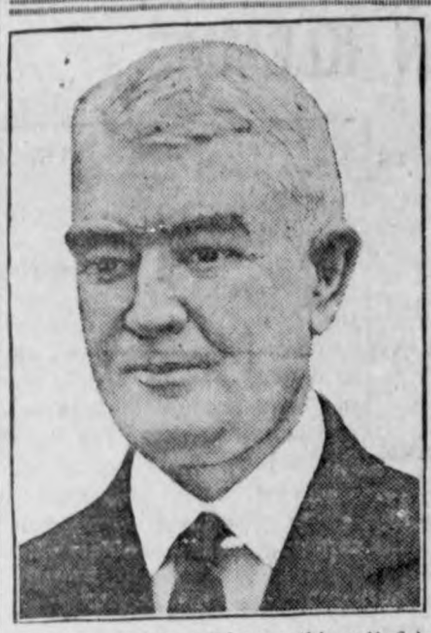
American Surgeon Honored in Euro



Dr. William J. Mayo, famous surgeon and head of the Mayo clinic, Rochester, Minn., is over in England this summer, attending surgical conventions, receiving honorary degrees and enjoying himself generally. Before he sailed he visited Montreal, where he was given the degree of doctor of Laws by McGill university. Trinity college, Dublin, he was made a Master of Surgery; and the university of Leeds gave him the degree of Doctor of Science. In London he attended the surgical congress of the Royal Society of Medicine, and there he read a paper on modern surgery before the International Surgical Congress.

Interviewed on reported cures for cancer, Dr. Mayo said:

"We oftttimes hear of so-called cures, but absolute cure is still far ahead. Few things, however, are impossible. There may eventually be a cure, but so far as I know, this relief has not been reached.

"The span of life in the last sixty years has increased from forty to two years on the average," said the surgeon; "an increase of twelve years in life's span. As cancer usually strikes the body after forty years of age, it probably accounts for the seeming increase of cancer. Heretofore people have died of other ailments before forty, or before the time when cancer usually begins to develop."

Elected the Third Bishop of Washington

In his earlier years a railway accountant, Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman has been elected, at the age of fifty-five, to be the third bishop of Washington, a place of high honor for which his fellow ministers and the Protestant Episcopal church generally think he is well qualified. In his new position he will be the head of the wonderful cathedral which is being built in the national capital.

Bishop Freeman was born in New York, and after passing through the public schools he spent fifteen years in the legal and accounting departments of the Long Island and New York Central railways. The late Bishop Henry C. Potter of New York had taken a great interest in the young man and induced him to enter the ministry, personally supervising his studies in that direction. In 1894 he was ordained deacon and the next year was made a priest, and after two years as assistant in St. John's church, Yonkers, he became rector of St. Andrew's Memorial church of that city. From 1910 until 1921 he was rector of St. Mark's church in Minneapolis, and then went to Epiphany church, Washington.

During the years of his ministry Bishop Freeman has done a lot of social work, has founded and developed workingmen's clubs and has served as arbitrator in various labor disputes. He is also the author of several volumes of prose and poetry.

Once Gaiety Girl, Now in Parliament

Not so many years ago one of the popular young women of the Gaiety theater in London was Mabel Russell, known as "the girl with the pansile eyes." The other day, as Mrs. Hilton Philipson, she took her seat in the house of commons—the seat from which her husband, Captain Philipson, had been ousted because his agent had violated the corrupt practices act in the campaign.

The former Gaiety girl had learned a lot on being the wife of a successful politician, and when the captain was unseated, through no fault of his own, she determined to enter the career in the family. So she went to the Conservative headquarters in London, presented her case to her old friend, Col. Leslie Wilson, chief whip of the party, used her "pretty eyes" and her famous smile, and got the support of the party. In the election she was victor over two opponents candidates by a large majority. How in the world did she do it? There were the eyes and the smile. There was also the blue crepe moraine frock with plain white Peter Pan collar. There was, too, a knowledge of men and women, a histrionic ability of no mean order, which, having served its purpose on the stage, was now to find expression in life.

She wore the same frock, the same Peter Pan collar when she was introduced into the house of commons. Lady Astor gave her a reassuring smile, a Labor member laughed and called across to the peer's wife: "Cheer up, Nancy!"

Judd, Explorer of the Chaco Canyon

Neil Merton Judd, director of the Pueblo Bonito expedition of the National Geographic society, has resumed exploration of the prehistoric ruin at Chaco canyon, New Mexico. Efforts are being directed to determine the water supply of this aboriginal apartment house of 900 rooms, considered to be one of the most important ruins in the United States. The expedition is also seeking to learn what forests supplied the beams used in the village, now 40 miles distant from any timber of comparable size. It is estimated the site has been deserted since years before Columbus came to America. If all rooms were occupied, it housed between 1,500 and 2,000 persons.

Mr. Judd, who was born in Nebraska in 1887 and was educated in the Utah and George Washington universities, is one of the leading archeologists of America. After engaging in exploration in Utah, Arizona and New Mexico, he joined the staff of the national museum as aid in ethnology and became successively assistant curator of anthropology and curator of American archeology. He restored the Pueblo ruins in the Navajo National Monument in Arizona for the Department of the Interior in 1917, and has conducted various expeditions with success.

CODLING MOTH SPRAY DUE SOON

The spray for the second brood of the coddling moth should be applied from about July 23 in the southern part of the state to August 2 in the northern section, says H. W. Richley of the horticultural department of tho Iowa State College. For apple scab and other fungious diseases which will also be present at the same time, it will be necessary to include fungicide in the spray.

The materials for this application are 1½ pounds of powdered arsenate of lead and five quarts commercial lime sulfur with enough wateer to make 50 gallons of mixture. The lime sulfur is for the control of the fungi and the dead for the codling moth and other biting insects. In case blotch is present, bordeaux mixture should be used instead of the lime sulfur. In bad cases. or on Northwestern Greenings, a spray of bordeaux two weeks earlier would be advisable. If the weather is hot and dry five quarts should be the maximum of lime sulfur and it may be better to use only four quarts. Larger amounts are apt to cause the leaves to burn.

The arsenate spray will also serve to help materially in the control of the apple maggot in case it is present in the northern parts of the state.

R. W. Elder and son, Clarence; and Albert Fuller, drove to Vernon Center, Minn., Sunday, for a visit with Marion Elder and other relatives and friends. They returned in the evening.

Ye Editor and family enjoyed a short vacation the past week. Early last Thursday morning we hit the trail for Lincoln, Nebraska for a few days visit with Mrs. J.'s relatives. We had about 150 miles of mud to go through getting there and went through five heavy rain storms besides. That part of the U. S. had a lot of rain but the crops are not as good as here. The season is late as they were still powing corn and only a little grain had been cut. Usually at this time of year they are threshing there.

Some men are so stingy they refuse to laugh at their own expense.

"Are Cylinder Walls Made Too Thin To Stand Renewing?"

This question is put to us so often that we shall endeavor to answer it here.

With the STORMIZING MACHINE you can effectively remove as much, or as little, metal as is necessary in each individual case. Yet, we wish if possible, to correct the erroneous impression that cylinder walls are made extremely thin and weak; and that there is danger in taking a reasonably heavy cut.

Cylinder walls are NOT made as thin, nor as weak, as some for selfish reasons, would lead us to believe. Modern Engineering Practice answers the question thus: "Cylinders are made with LIBERAL margin of safety."

This is to allow for the variation in casting and machining. Enlarging the bore .030 oversize means removing only .015 from each side—the thickness of four or five sheets of the ordinary writing paper. A wall that would not safely stand this cut would be too weak to stand ordinary wear. In other words, there is obviously no more danger in enlarging the bore by machining than to enlarge it by wear." The practice of boring .030 to .060 is quite universal and many cylinders will stand 1-8 inch oversize with perfect safety.

If your motor pumps oil and loss of power, all the new rings or oversize pistons put in will not remedy the cause unless the motor is STORMIZED.

DON'T KILL THE GOOSE THAT LAYS THE GOLDEN EGG

Ask some of your friends who patronize cream stations where no creamery is in competition with them what they think of the service and prices they are receiving.
Dairying is the main stay of this country, it produces greater profits, keeps your land in a high state of cultivation and is the means of enabling you to meet your current bills promptly and lay aside the money received from the sale of your hogs or cattle to either reduce your indebtedness or build up a bank account.
You wouldn't think of trading off a good, high grade milch cow for a non-producing scrub? Why not patronize and build up an institution that enables you to receive the very top prices for your dairy products rather than some corporation in which you have no interest?

ANOTHER GOVERNMENT CRIES ENOUGH

There was considerable state socialism in Germany before the war. State socialism was, indeed, a Hohenzollern pet. Bismarck found it very well adapted to certain monarchistic proceedures. The German states owned mines of various kinds. During the war monarchy became the owner of various enterprises, such as the manfacture of aluminum Since the revolution these several mines and factories have been the property of the new republic or of the several component states. They have been operated as goverment businesses. The traditional German civil servants were good officials, faithfud well-trained and intelligent It was therefore generaly expected, in Germany. that these state enterprises would be well- managed and sucessful.

The Germans are a methodical people, if anything, overprone to scrutiny and analysis. In 1919 a commission was set up to study the question of the nationalization of all mining operations for coal, potash and salt. The commission, working especially on coal, was not able, despite its socialistic complexion, to make recommendation for general and immediate nationalization. The subject has been continuously under investigation, in one form or another since that time. Opinion has now crystallized, especially in Prussia, and this has taken effect in several bills in the direction of the denationalization of mines and industries.

These years have been years of scarcity of coal, metals and chemicals in Germany. That was like operating on a rising market. This is no test of any business. Nevertheless, out of the experiences of the state-controlled and private operations during these three years two large facts have emerged: Operating costs have been uniformly higher, and much higher, under state operation. With normal conditions of competition and trade these higher costs would have spelled bankruptcy. Secondly under state operation the mobility of the management has been restricted. Private management has proved itself able more quickly and accurately to adapt manufacture and marketing in the state-operated concerns. It is now proposed to turn the state properties back to private operation, by sale or lease and this in interest of he property holders. the state. Saturday Evening Post.

THE VISITORS

SYNOPSIS.—Arriving at the lonely little railroad station at El Cajon, New Mexico, Madeline Hammond, New York society girl, finds no one to meet her. While in the waiting room, a drunken cowboy enters, asks if she is married, and departs, leaving her terrified. He returns with a priest, who goes through some sort of ceremony, and the cowboy forces her to say "Si." Asking her name and learning her identity the cowboy seems dazed. In a shooting scrape outside the room a Mexican is killed. The cowboy lets a girl, Bonita, take his horse and escape, then conducts Madeline to Florence Kingsley, friend of her brother. Florence welcomes her, learns her story, and dismisses the cowboy, Gene Stewart. Next day Alfred Hammond, Madeline's brother, takes Stewart to task. Madeline exonerates him of any wrong intent. Alfred, scion of a wealthy family, has been dismissed from his home because of his dissipation. Madeline sees that the West has redeemed him. She meets Stillwell, Al's employer, typical western ranchman. Stillwell tells her how Stewart beat up the sheriff to save her from arrest and then lit out for the border. Danny Mains, one of Stillwell's cowboys, has disappeared, with some of Stillwell's money. His friends link his name with the girl Bonita. Madeline gets a glimpse of life on a western ranch. Stewart sends Madeline his horse Majesty. She buys out Stillwell and "Her Majesty's Rancho" becomes famous. She finds her life work under "The Light of Western Stars." Learning Stewart had been hurt in a brawl at Chiricahua, Madeline visits him and persuades him to come to the ranch as the boss of her cowboys. Jim Nels, Nick Steele and "Monty" Price are Madeline's chief riders. They have a feud with Don Carlos' vaqueros, who are really guerrillas. Madeline makes Stewart promise that peace is kept. They raid Don Carlos' ranch for contraband arms. Madeline and Florence, returning home from Alfred's ranch, run into an ambush of vaqueros. Florence decoys them away, and Madeline gets home safely. A raiding guerrilla band carries off Madeline. Stewart follows alone. He releases the girl, arranging for ransom. Returning home with Stewart, Madeline finds herself strangely stirred. Madeline's sister Helen, with a party of eastern friends, arrives at the ranch, craving excitement.

Edith Wayne was a patrician brunette, a serious, soft-voiced woman, sweet and kindly, despite a rather bitter experience that had left her worldly wise. Mrs. Carrollton Beck, a plain, lively person, had chaperoned the party. The fourth and last of the feminine contingent was Miss Dorothy Coombs—Dot, as they called her—a young woman of attractive blond prettiness.

For a man Castleton was of very small stature. He had a pink-and-white complexion, a small golden mustache, and his heavy eyelids, always drooping, made him look dull. His attire, cut to what appeared to be an exaggerated English style, attracted attention to his diminutive size. He was immaculate and fastidious. Robert Steede was a rather large florid young man, remarkable only for his good nature. Counting Boyd Harvey, a handsome, pale-faced fellow, with the careless smile of the man for whom life had been easy and pleasant, the party was complete.

"Majesty, have you planned any fun, any excitement for us?" asked Helen. "Above all, Majesty, we want something to happen."

"My dear sister, maybe you will have your wish fulfilled," replied Madeline, cheerly. "Edith, Helen has made me curious about your especial yearning."

"Majesty, it is only that I wanted to be with you for a while," replied the old friend.

There was in the wistful reply, accompanied by a dark and eloquent glance of eyes, that told Madeline of Edith's understanding, of her sympathy, and perhaps a betrayal of her own unquiet soul. It saddened Madeline. How many women might there not be who had the longing to break down the bars of their cage, but had not the spirit!

CHAPTER XIII

Cowboy Golf.

In the whirl of the succeeding days it was a mooted question whether Madeline's guests or her cowboys or herself got the keenest enjoyment out of the flying time. Considering the keenness of the cowboys' ordinary life, she was inclined to think they made the most of the present. Stillwell and Stewart, however, had found the situation trying. The work of the ranch had to go on, and some of it got badly neglected. Stillwell could not resist the ladies any more than he could resist the fun in the extraordinary goings on of the cowboys. Stewart alone kept the business of cattle-raising from a serious setback. Early and late he was in the saddle, driving the lazy Mexicans whom he had hired to relieve the cowboys.

One morning in June Madeline was sitting on the porch with her merry friends when Stillwell appeared on the corral path. He had not come to consult Madeline for several days—an omission so unusual as to be remarked.

"Here comes Bill—in trouble," laughed Florence.

Indeed, he bore some faint resemblance to a thundercloud as he approached the porch; but the greetings he got from Madeline's party, especially from Helen and Dorothy, chased away the blackness from his face and brought the wonderful wrinkling smile.

"Miss Majesty, sure I'm a sad demoralized old cattleman," he said, presently. "An' I'm in need of a heap of help."

"Very well; unburden yourself."

"Wal, the cowboys have gone plumb batty, jest plain crazy over this heah game of gol-lof."

A merry peal of mirth greeted Stillwell's solemn assertion.

"Oh, Stillwell, you are in fun," replied Madeline.

"I hope to die if I'm not in daid earnest," declared the cattleman. "It's an amazin' strange fact. Ask Flo. She'll tell you. She knows cowboys, an' how if they ever start on somethin' they ride it as they ride a hoss."

Florence being appealed to, and evidently feeling all eyes upon her, modestly replied that Stillwell had scarcely misstated the situation.

"Cowboys play like they work or fight," she added. "They give their whole souls to it. They are great big simple boys."

"Indeed they are," said Madeline. "Oh, I'm glad if they like the game of golf. They have so little play."

"Wal, somethin's got to be did if we're to go on raisin' cattle at Her Majesty's Rancho," replied Stillwell. He appeared both deliberate and resigned.

Madeline remembered that despite Stillwell's simplicity he was as deep as any of his cowboys, and there was absolutely no gaging him where possibilities of fun were concerned. Madeline fancied that his exaggerated talk about the cowboys' sudden craze for golf was in line with certain other remarkable tales that had lately emanated from him. Some very strange things had occurred of late, and it was impossible to tell whether or not they were accidents, mere coincidents, or deep-laid, skillfully worked-out designs of the fun-loving cowboys. Certainly there had been great fun, and at the expense of her guests, particularly Castleton. So Madeline was at a loss to know what to think about Stillwell's latest elaboration. From mere force of habit she sympathized with him and found difficulty in doubting his apparent sincerity.

"To go back a ways," went on Stillwell, as Madeline looked on expectantly, "you recollect what pride the boys took in fixin' up that gol-lof course out on the mesa? Wal, they worked on the job, an' though I never seen any other course, I'll gamble yours can't be beat. The boys was sure curious about that game. You recollect also how they all wanted to see you an' your brother play, an' be caddies for you? Wal, whenever you'd quit they'd go to work tryin' to play the game. Monty Price, he was the leadin' spirit. Old as I am, Miss Majesty, an' used as I am to cowboy excentrikities, I nearly dropped daid when I heerd that little hobble-footed, burned-up Montana cow-puncher say there wasn't any game too swell for him, an' gol-lof was just his speed. Serious as a preacher, mind you, he was. An' he was always practicin'. When Stewart gave him charge of the course an' the clubhouse an' all them funny sticks, why, Monty was tickled to death. You see, Monty is sensitive that he ain't much good any more for cowboy work. He was glad to have a job that he didn't feel he was hangin' to by kindness. Wal, he practiced the game, an' he read the books in the clubhouse, an' he got the boys to doin' the same. That wasn't very hard, I reckon. They played early an' late an' in the moonlight. For a while Monty was coach, an' the boys stood it. But pretty soon Frankie Slade got puffed on his game, an' he had to have it out with Monty. Wal, Monty beat him bad. Then one after another the other boys tackled Monty. He beat them all. After that they split up an' began to play matches, two on a side. For a spell this worked fine. But cowboys can't never be satisfied long onless they win all the time. Monty an' Link Stevens, both cripples, you might say, joined forces an' elected to beat all comers. Wal, they did, an' that's the trouble. Down at the bunks in the evenin's it's some mortifyin' the way Monty an' Link crow over the rest of the outfit. They've taken on superior airs. You couldn't reach up to Monty with a trimmed spruce pole. An' Link—wal, he's just amazin' scornful. I want to say, for the good of ranchin', not to mention a possible fight, that Monty an' Link hev got to be beat. There'll be no peace round this ranch till that's done."

"Miss Majesty, Sure I'm a Sad Demoralized Old Cattleman," He Said Presently.

Madeline could hardly control her mirth.

"What in the world can I do?"

"Wal, I reckon I couldn't say. I only come to you for advice. All I'm sure of is that the conceit has got to be taken out of Monty an' Link."

"Stillwell, listen," said Madeline, brightly. "We'll arrange a match game, a foursome, between Monty and Link and your best picked team. Castleton, who is an expert golfer, will umpire. My sister, and friends, and I will take turns as caddies for your team. That will be fair, considering yours is the weaker. Caddies may coach, and perhaps expert advice is all that is necessary for your team to defeat Monty's."

"A grand idee," declared Stillwell, with instant decision. "When can we have this match game?"

"Why, today—this afternoon. We'll all ride out to the links."

The idea was as enthusiastically received by Madeline's guests as it had been by Stillwell. Madeline was pleased to note how seriously they had taken the old cattleman's story. She had a little throb of wild expectancy that made her both fear and delight in the afternoon's prospect.

The June days had set in warm; in fact, hot during the noon hours; and this had inculcated in her insatiable visitors a tendency to profit by the experience of those used to the Southwest. They indulged in the restful siesta during the heated term of the day.

Madeline was awakened by Majesty's well-known whistle and pounding on the gravel. Then she heard the other horses. When she went out she found her party assembled in gala golf attire, and with spirits to match their costumes. Castleton, especially, appeared resplendent in a golf coat that beggared description. Madeline had faint misgivings when she reflected on what Monty and Nels and Nick might do under the influence of that blazing garment.

"Oh, Majesty," cried Helen, as Madeline went up to her horse, "don't make him kneel! Try that flying mount. We all want to see it. It's so stunning."

"But that way, too, I must have him kneel," said Madeline, "or I can't reach the stirrup. He's so tremendously high."

Madeline had to yield to the laughing insistence of her friends, and after all of them except Florence were up she made Majesty go down on one knee. Then she stood on his left side, facing back, and took a good firm grip on the bridle and pommel and his mane. After she had slipped the toe of her boot firmly into the stirrup she called to Majesty. He jumped and swung her up into the saddle.

"Now just to see how it ought to be done watch Florence," said Madeline.

The Western girl was at her best in riding-habit and with her horse. It was beautiful to see the ease and grace with which she accomplished the cowboys' flying mount. Then she led the party down the slope and across the flat to climb the mesa.

Madeline never saw a group of cowboys without looking them over, almost unconsciously, for her foreman, Gene Stewart. This afternoon, as usual, he was not present. However, she now had a sense—of which she was wholly conscious—that she was both disappointed and irritated. He had really not been attentive to her guests, and he, of all her cowboys, was the one of whom they wanted most to see something.

Stewart, however, immediately slipped out of her mind as she surveyed the group of cowboys on the links. By actual count there were sixteen, not including Stillwell. The cowboys were on dress-parade, looking very different in Madeline's eyes, at least, from the way cowboys usually appeared. Sombreros with silver buckles and horsehair bands were in evidence; and bright silk scarfs, embroidered vests, fringed and ornamented chaps, huge swinging guns, and clinking silver spurs lent a festive appearance.

"Wal, you-all raced over, I seen," said Stillwell, taking Madeline's bridle. "Get down—get down. We're sure amazin' glad an' proud. An', Miss Majesty, I'm offerin' to beg pawdin for the way the boys are packin' guns. Mebbe it ain't polite. But it's Stewart's orders."

"Stewart's orders!" echoed Madeline. Her friends were suddenly silent.

"I reckon he won't take no chances on the boys bein' surprised sudden by raiders. An' there's raiders operatin' in from the Guadalupes. That's all. Nothin' to worry over. I was just explainin'."

Madeline, with several of her party, expressed relief, but Helen showed excitement and then disappointment.

"Oh, I want something to happen!" she cried.

Sixteen pairs of keen cowboy eyes fastened intently upon her pretty, petulant face; and Madeline divined, if Helen did not, that the desired consummation was not far off.

"So do I," said Dot Coombs. "It would be perfectly lovely to have a real adventure."

The gaze of the sixteen cow boys shifted and sought the demure face of this other discontented girl. Madeline laughed, and Stillwell wore his strange, moving smile.

Monty and Link, like two emperors, came stalking across the links.

Madeline's friends were hugely amused over the prospective match; but, except for Dorothy and Castleton,

No Action of His Was Any Longer Insignificant, but Violent Action Meant So Much.

they disclaimed any ambition for active participation. Accordingly, Madeline appointed Castleton to judge the play, Dorothy to act as caddie for Ed Linton, and she herself to be caddie for Ambrose. While Stillwell beamingly announced this momentous news to his team and supporters Monty and Link were striding up.

Both were diminutive in size, bow-legged, lame in one foot, and altogether unprepossessing. Link was young, and Monty's years, more than twice Link's, had left their mark. But it would have been impossible to tell Monty's age. He was burned to the color and hardness of a cinder. He was dark-faced, swaggering, for all the world like a barbarian chief.

"That Monty makes my flesh creep," said Helen, low-voiced. "Really, Mr. Stillwell, is he so bad—desperate—as I've heard? Did he ever kill anybody?"

"Sure. 'Most as many as Nels," replied Stillwell, cheerfully.

"Oh! And is that nice Mr. Nels a desperado, too? I wouldn't have thought so. He's so kind and old-fashioned and soft-voiced."

"Nels is sure an example of the dooplicity of men, Miss Helen. Don't you listen to his soft voice. He's really as bad as a side-winder rattlesnake."

One of the cowboys came for Castleton and led him away to exploit upon ground rules.

The game began. At first Madeline and Dorothy essayed to direct the endeavors of their respective players. But all they said and did only made their team play the worse. At the third hole they were far behind and hopelessly bewildered.

Madeline and her party sat up to watch the finish of the match. It came with spectacular suddenness. A sharp yell pealed out, and all the cowboys turned attentively in its direction. A big black horse had surmounted the rim of the mesa and was just breaking into a run. His rider yelled sharply to the cowboys. They wheeled to dash toward their grazing horses.

"That's Stewart. There is something wrong," said Madeline, in alarm.

Castleton stared. The other men exclaimed uneasily. The women sought Madeline's face with anxious eyes.

The black got into his stride and bore swiftly down upon them.

Madeline divided her emotions between growing alarm of some danger menacing and a thrill and quickening of pulse-beat that tingled over her whenever she saw Stewart in violent action. No action of his was any longer insignificant, but violent action meant so much. It might mean anything. For one moment she remembered Stillwell and all his talk about fun, and plots, and tricks to amuse her guests. Then she discountenanced the thought. Stewart might lend himself to a little fun, but he cared too much for a horse to run him at that speed unless there was imperious need. That alone sufficed to answer Madeline's questioning curiosity. And her alarm mounted to fear not so much for herself as for her guests. But what danger could there be? She could think of nothing except the guerrillas.

Whatever threatened, it would be met and checked by this man Stewart, who was thundering up on his fleet horse; and as he neared her, so that she could see the dark gleam of face and eyes, she had a strange feeling of trust in her dependence upon him.

The big black was so close to Madeline and her friends that when Stewart pulled him the dust and sand kicked up by his pounding hoofs flew in their faces.

"Oh, Stewart, what is it?" cried Madeline.

"Guess I scared you, Miss Hammond," he replied. "But I'm pressed for time. There's a gang of bandits hiding on the ranch, most likely in a deserted hut. They held up a train near Agua Prieta. Pat Hawe is with the posse that's trailing them, and you know Pat has no use for us. I'm afraid it wouldn't be pleasant for you or your guests to meet either the posse or the bandits."

"I fancy not," said Madeline, considerably relieved. "We'll hurry back to the house."

They exchanged no more speech at the moment, and Madeline's guests were silent. Perhaps Stewart's actions and looks belied his calm words. His piercing eyes roved round the rim of the mesa, and his face was as hard and stern as chiseled bronze.

Monty and Nick came galloping up, each leading several horses by the bridles. Nels appeared behind them with Majesty, and he was having trouble with the roan. Madeline observed that all the other cowboys had disappeared.

One sharp word from Stewart calmed Madeline's horse; the other horses, however, were frightened and not inclined to stand. The men mounted without trouble, and likewise Madeline and Florence. But Edith Wayne and Mrs. Beck, being nervous and almost helpless, were with difficulty gotten into the saddle.

"Beg pardon, but I'm pressed for time," said Stewart, coolly, as with iron arm he forced Dorothy's horse almost to its knees. Dorothy, who was active and plucky, climbed astride; and when Stewart loosed his hold on bit and mane the horse doubled up and began to buck. Dorothy screamed as she shot into the air. Stewart, as quick as the horse, leaped forward and caught Dorothy in his arms. She had slipped head downward, and, had he not caught her, would have had a serious fall. Stewart, handling her as if she were a child, turned her right side up to set her pon her feet. Dorothy evidently thought only of the spectacle she presented, and made startled motions to readjust her riding-habit. It was no time to laugh, though Madeline felt as if she wanted to. Besides, it was impossible to be anything but sober with Stewart in violent mood. For he had jumped at Dorothy's stubborn mount. All cowboys were masters of horses. It was wonderful to see him conquer the vicious animal. He was cruel, perhaps, yet it was from necessity. When, presently, he led the horse back to Dorothy she mounted without further trouble. Meanwhile, Nels and Nick had lifted Helen into her saddle.

"We'll take the side trail," said Stewart, shortly, as he swung upon the big black. Then he led the way, and the other cowboys trotted in the rear.

It was a loose trail. The weathered slopes seemed to slide under the feet of the horses. Dust-clouds formed; rocks rolled and rattled down; cactus spikes tore at horse and rider. Half the time Madeline could not distinguish those ahead through the yellow dust. It was dry and made her cough. The horses snorted. At length the clouds of dust thinned and Madeline saw the others before her ride out upon a level. Soon she was down, and Stewart also.

The alert, quiet manner of all the cowboys was not reassuring. As they resumed the ride it was noticeable that Nels and Nick were far in advance, Monty stayed far in the rear, and Stewart rode with the party. Madeline knew that they were really being escorted home under armed guard.

When they rounded the head of the mesa, bringing into view the ranch-house and the valley, Madeline saw dust or smoke hovering over a hut upon the outskirts of the Mexican quarters. As the sun had set and the light was fading, she could not distinguish which it was. Then Stewart set a fast pace for the house. In a few minutes the party was in the yard, ready and willing to dismount.

Stillwell appeared, ostensibly cheerful, too cheerful to deceive Madeline. She noted also that a number of armed cowboys were walking with their horses just below the house.

"Wal, you-all had a nice little run," Stillwell said, speaking generally. "I reckon there wasn't much need of it. Pat Hawe thinks he's got some outlaws corralled on the ranch. Nothin' at all to be fussed up about. Stewart's that particular he won't have you meetin' with any rowdies."

Many and fervent were the expressions of relief from Madeline's feminine guests as they dismounted and went into the house. Madeline lingered behind to speak with Stillwell and Stewart.

"That gang of bandits Pat Hawe was chasin'—they're hidin' in the house."

Possible to Be Too Critical.

VETERAN HAS LOST MEMORY

American Legion Is Seeking Friends of Man Supposed to Be "Howard Grimes."

Physically and mentally normal, with the one exception of amnesia or memory loss, "Howard Grimes," a veteran of the World war, is endeavoring to recall his past history. "Grimes" is a patient in the Charity hospital of New Orleans while his comrades of the American Legion are searching for relatives or friends.

Suddenly attacked at a motion picture theater with convulsions, the missing man was taken to the hospital. In his pockets were found business cards with the name, "Howard Grimes," and the title, "state distributor for the Alco Rim Tool company, P. O. Box 4457, Jacksonville, Fla." Communications to that address resulted in the discovery that the box had been closed and that no one in Jacksonville knew of such a company.

In his clouded memory there are flashes of the vision of a tropical land, of men in big straw hats and white clothes, and unshaven faces. The Woolworth building of New York looms in his memory. In a diary he keeps appear engineering notes, columns of figures. His soft hands attest to the fact that he has not done manual labor for some time, if ever. He is puzzled that he shaves and uses a telephone automatically, though he has no memory of razors or telephones in his past.

Anyone who recognizes the man is asked to communicate with A. M. Daspit, chairman of the service division of the Legion in New Orleans.

IN EFFORT TO EDUCATE ALL

Legion Department Commander of Arkansas Is Carrying Gospel to Every Section of State.

O. L. Bodenhammer, department commander of the American Legion in Arkansas, is making a determined effort to aid in bringing about education of men, women and children. Bodenhammer has been carrying the gospel of education into every section of his state, and has aroused the interest of the citizenry in the question.

One of the most interesting phases the campaign has been the work of the Legion leader with the school children of the state. At one meeting in Fort Smith, Mr. Bodenhammer spoke to 2,000 school children using patriotism as his theme.

"Ten million American-born men and women now in this country are not able to read and write," he told the children. "The American Legion stands for better education as protection to the future citizens of America."

Following the address, a stand of national colors was presented to the school as a gift from the local Legion post.

At a recent conference of educational officials of southern states on illiteracy, Commander Bodenhammer declared that illiteracy stood opposed to the development of a patriotic citizenship; that it was detrimental to the building of a citizenship of defenders; that it prevented a voting citizenship; and that it impeded the progress of a law-abiding citizenship.

POST ADOPTS SCOUT TROOP

New Jersey Boys, Aided by Ex-Service Men's Organization, Enjoy Field Day Program.

A boy scout troop, composed of newsboys of Trenton, N. J., was formally adopted by the Elkins Oliphant post of the American Legion. The boys took great interest in their scout work and were particularly intent on joining in the annual scout field day, which was to be held on an island in the river.

But if the boys left their posts throughout the day, it meant considerable financial loss to them, so they turned to the Legion men for help. The Legionnaires solved the problem in a very happy way for all concerned. Enlisting the aid of a local newspaper, a special Legion edition was arranged on the day of the meet, and the post members took over the boys' routes and corners. The lads were promised the full amount of their regular earnings, with the understanding that any money over would go to the scout fund to purchase uniforms for the troop. Citizens of Trenton supported the edition and $300 was earned for the fund. In the meantime the boys were down on the river passing scout tests and otherwise enjoying themselves.

A SECTION FOR FARMERS; SOME VALUABLE INEORMATION

SPRAYING FOR FLIES AIDS MILK PRODUCTION

There are three factors that tend to reduce the flow of milk during the summer, hot weather, poor pasture and flies. The first, and to some extent the second, are beyond the control of the diaryman, but the loss from the third can be greatly reduced, if proper steps are taken at the right time. Sanitation and the use of a good fly spray will greatly reduce the loss caused by flies, say Purdue Universal diarymen.

This loss is due partly to the direct loss of blood drawn from the animal by the insects. The great numbers that infest the herd day and night gorge themselves with quanities of blood. Besides this, the excitement and annoyance caused during the heat of the day, when the herd seeks some shady place to find comfort, exerts no small influence on the daily milk flow. Flies may become so troublesome at certain seasons of the year that animals are driven frantic. This not only affects the milk flow. but may lead to a loss of flesh.

The removal of all unnesary material around the yards, especially fresh manure, is a very effective means of controling the fly menace. The darker the stable can be kept during the heat of the day the better. Whitewash darkened with some coloring mater, such as lampblack may be applied to the windows. Sacking hung from the top of the door keeps the stable dark while the cows are entering and also serves to brush off a number at the same time, Some diaries equip the windoys and doors with screens. This is especially valuable when the practice of keeping the herd indoors during the heat of the day is followed.

During fly time each herd should be sprayed once or twice daily with some spray mixture. No fly repellent has yet been devised which is satisfactory as a permanent spray. But there are a number on the market which greatly reduce the attacks of these insects.

CANADA THISTLE ERADICATION

Prof. Hauser of Ames Tells How It Should Be Done

Four hundred and thirty farmers left their harvxest and hay fields to attend the demonstraions given on the eradication of the Canadian thistles during the past week. These demonstrations were conducted by he Farm Bureau, under the direction of Prof. M. H. Hauser of the Extension department at Ames.

"Canada thistles are tough customers", said Mr. Hauser, "and there is no easy method of eradicating them. We have found that the latter part of July is the best time to start working on them. If you have a patch, find out how deep the underground root stock is, and then plow so as to bring these to the surface. Pick up all roots you can and then cultivate the field with a light draft harrow, spring tooth harrow, or a cultivator set deep. Then you can pick up some more roots. Carry these roots away and either dry and burn them, or put them in a feed lot where they will be tramped and not allowed to grow. The remaining roots can then be smothered by deep cultivation once every four days. If you drown a rat, it will take quite a while to kill him if you let him come to surface and get a breath of air occassionally, but if you duck him under, and hold him there, it does not take long to kill him. The same principle holds true in the case of the Canada thistles, or any other perennial. If they can't get light they cannot manufacture food, and consequently will starve to death."

A large amount of interest was displayed in all the seventeen townships where meetings were held. The farmers seem fuly awake to the threatened danger of the Canada thistle invasion, and are determined to stamp it out.

"Iowa has a good weed law," says Mr. Hauser. "All it needs is proper enforcement." If each township trus tee does his duty, there is no question but what the weed can be stamped out of any community.

GETTING MORE EGGS IN THE SUMMER-TIME

"The egg crop during July and August is always small," writes Michae K. Boyer, The Farm Journal Poultry Editor, in the July issue.

"The hot suns and the sultry air are as depressing to fowls and beasts as they are to man. Broodiness and the advanced stages of molting also slacken the laying.

"A generous shade during the day nd fresh-air housing conditions at nouses give the fowls the benefit of night are essential. Open front cool, pure air at night, without the danger of exposure to rain and wind storms. The water supply should be fresh and clean, and the vessels kept in the coolest possible place.

"Summer feeding must not be so heavy as winter feeding. A grain ration of two-parts each (by measure) of wheat and oats and one part of corn will keep the fowls more comfortable than when more corn is used. A sole diet is injurious for corn is heating and too fattening.

"Mashes should be made of two parts by weight bran and one part each of middlings, corn meal, ground oats and meat scrap. Feeding the mashes dry instead of moist is preferable, especially during the summer.

"Where fowls are confided to runs, green food, such as lawn clippings, vegetable tops, weeds, cabbages or sprouted oats, should be fed.

"Milk is an excellent summer food. No matter in what form—buttermilk skimmilk or sour milk—it is always relished by the fowls.

Each year I aim to get ou t a goodly number of hatches during the months of June, July and August and save the pullets." says M. K. Boyer, The Farm Journal Poultry Editor. "With good care these pullets keep right on growing and begin their laying in January February or March, according to the time they were hatched, and they keep it up right to the end of the year, doing their best laying during the summer months. Green food will help cut down the feed cost.

"As hot weather will quickly stale eggs, they should be gathered several times during the course of the day and kept in a cool, dry, well ventilated cellar, and marketed every three days if not oftener.

"It is important that the air be pure and free from bad odor. I once had a dozen eggs in a paper bag standing overnight a foot away from a pound of tar-camphor balls also in a paper bag. The next day the camphor flavor was so strong in the eggs they could not be used." — Herald-Press.

CARE DOUBLES EGG YIELD

Record Flocks Yield Average of 119 Eggs Per Year.

What proper care, management feeding and culling of poultry folcks will do to increase the egg production is shown by figures of the state for last year, which have just been compiled by the poultry extension service of the college. The average number of flocks which reported dur ing the year was 266.

The average production per hen in the poultry record flocks was 119 Poultry men estimate the average for the state at about 58. This gives a difference in production of 100 per cent in favor of the flocks which were properly handled. This increased production has come largely in the winter months, when eggs sell at the highest price.

The average revenue from all the Iowa flocks, the poultrymen say, is about $325 a year. In the record focks the average revenue was $563. 42, a difference of $238,42. If all the flocks in a single county could be placed on the same basis of production as the record flocks it would an added net revenue for the county of $475,000.

REDUCE INFANT MORTALITY

One of the Slogan's to be Used at Iowa State Fair

"Reduce Iowa's infant mortality." "Reduce the death rate among moth ers at child birth."

This is the slogan of a great move ment to be launched at the coming Iowa State Fair in connection with the widely-known annual Iowa baby health contest.

Instead of making it a contest merely for the selection of the healthiest baby in the state, Fair officials have announced that this year the event will be equally important for babies who are not heathy, and for mothers interested in learning more about maternity care.

Over 18,000 mothers died in the United States last year at the time of child birth. Doctors say that most of them could have been saved.

Thousands of babies died in their first two or three years because of improper care.

The State Fair baby health depart ment—a feature of the women's program—is going to take this subject in hand and devote seven days to it with sessions every morning & afternoon of the Fair. Every woman in the state is invited to attend the meeings, lecures and discussions.

Over 500 babies are expected to be entered in the regular baby health csontest at the Fair, Aug. 22

FRUIT SHERBET EASILY MADE

Too Much Salt Does Not Hasten Freezing Process.

A fruit sherbet in which milk is used and which is easy to make satisfactorily at home is reccomended by Miss Belle Lowe of the home economics division of the Iowa State College.

The ingredients consist of 4 cups of milk, 2 cups of juice or pulp of any fruit, 1-2 cup of lemon juice and 2 cups of sugar.

For freezing one cup of salt should be used to 3 quarts of cracked ice. A larger proportion of salt than this does not hasten the freezing. The finer the ice and salt the more quickly freezing will take place.

The freezer can should be filled only about three-fourths full to allow for the expansion of the liquid when it freezes and for the swell caused by the beating of air into the mixture. The freezer should be turned slowly at first and very rapidly while hardening.

GLACIAL PERIOD IS RESPONSIBLE FOR LAND OF THE TALL CORN

Glacial Period Is Credited With Grinding Rocks Into Fertile Mid-West Land

CHICAGO—The abundant crop yields of the farmers of the middle west, their fat swine and their fine homes are due largely to the fact that more than 50,000 years ago this acreage was covered with ice.

This is the opinion of Professor Willim H. Haas, of the geology department of Northwestern university, as revealed in a report which he submitted recently. Professor Haas made a careful research of the subject and concentrated his observations upon Ohio.

Professor explained that the soils in the glaciated section of the continent and the driftless area, to be quite different. In the glaciated the soils are more diversified and of better quality. The driftless area, the geololist said, covers some 10,000 square miles and embraces northwestern Illinois, a small part of Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota. The pressure exerted by the glaciers many years ago crushed the rocks and mixed the dirt as they rolled southward; hence the many soils and the many fields of tall corn.

"The remarkable thing to me, the gealogists said in speaking of Ohio. "is to notice how suddenly the tall corn will end, to be neighbored by stunted stalks and shrivelled ears. Fine homes will be replaced on these miserable farms by hovels, and the people are apparently poverty stricken. All of this in on account of the fact that many centuries ago, scores of geologists believe— some rocks of a peculiar hardness, able to withstand the onward sweep of the icefields from the north, deflected the fields, thus leaving the area, which the rocks appeared to protect, unglaciated. That, in my opinion, accounts for these 10,000 square miles of comparatively poor soil; or, a geogists say, driftless area."

The glaciers accompolished three great effects. Professor Haas declared. They decreased the relief; or a the laymen would say, cut down the hills and filed the valleys, It ground up the rock and mixed the dirt.

THE WRONG PICTURE

It seems ridiculous to hear politicians and labor agitators get up and tear the air expounding on the fight between labor and capital. To hear their speeches and public utterances; an uniformed person would have a vision of the wealthy men in this nation hiding behind breastworks of money bags and fighting off starving millions who are trying to scale this wall of gold.

In the next month, we read in our daily paper that a rich empoyer in New York has turned over his clothing business to a few employees. Automatically these employees become the hated capitalist and take their places behind the barriers of gold, which in turn the workman they hire will strive to tear down.

Is not this the wrong picture to flash before the eyes of millions? Is not a capitalist any individual who has saved fifty or a hundred dollars and through wise investment either in a peanut wagon, a bootblack stand or an industriaal or government bond, caused that money to earn more dollars.

Is the man who saves one hundred dollars which he puts in a public utility or a sawmill property, where, with money contributed by hundreds of others like himself, it employs thousands of people at good wages, a bad citizen? Yet he is a capitalist just as truly as the man who invests a hundred thousand or a million dollars.

When there is removed the incentive for the man with one hundred dollars to increase that amount to one thousand and then to ten thousand dollars, and so on, there is also removed the chance of reward that is at stake for which the average able bodied American strives.

The majority of capitalists today started as hand workers, and yet, according to the radical politicians and labor agitators, the salvation of the country lies denying to others the chance which these men had to benefit themselves and, incidenly, humanity in general through the modern conveniences they have given to the humblest American citizen.

They are telling the Russian children that there is no Santa Claus, but many will ask, "Well what is the United States then?"

MRS. EMMA GIBBS APPOINTED POST MISTRESS

HONK OF AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE HEARD IN EVERY TRY

A bulliten issued by the National City Bank of New York says that the American automobile honks in every language of the world and is doing business, in every clime. It shouts its warning in more than 100 different countries, colonies and islands and it renders service from Iceland, in the far north, to the equator and thence the most extreme southern line of human habiation.

It takes the steep Andes or the Himalayas with the same complacancy with which it traverses the pampas of South America or the desert roadways of Africa and Australia. During the past ten years, America shipped to foreign countries more than a million passenger cars valued at $434,000,000 and commercial machines worth perhaps $288,000,000.

These figures do not include separate motors, tires and parts, which woul increase our total foreign sales at least $200,000,000.

TEST SOY BEANS FOR HOGGING DOWN

To find out the value of soy beans in corn for hogging down and to compare them with rape and rye are the purposes of an experment which will be started soon by the animal husbandry section of the Agricultural Experiment Station.

The check lot will receive standing corn plus some tankage. A second bunch of pigs will be turned into corn in which rape has been planted at the last cultivation. Standing corn and rye planted at the last cultivation will be the fare of the third group.

J. W. WATERMAN IN SERVICE 9 YEARS, STEPS OUT AUGUST 5th

Has Given Good Service And Improved Post Office To A High Standard

At last the post office officials in Washington have given out the appointment for Posmaster for the office here and the riddle has been solved.

Klemme people have wondered for a long time who would get the appointment as it had sifted down to two candidaes—the present postmaser, and Mrs. Emma Gibbs, who also passed a successful examination for the position. Mrs. Gibbs was given the appointment.

Mr. Waterman has been in service here about nine years; five years under the Civil Service plan, and four years under the Presidential rule, being given the appointment under the latter during the Democratic administration of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. Waterman has been conscientious in his work and we have never heard a single complaint regarding his work and he has strived to give the best of service and he has succeeded, gaining a great host of friends.

Mr. Waterman deserves a great amount of credit as he has built up the post office here and brought it to a high standard. Among his accomplishments which deserve more than ordinary mention Klemme is proud of the beautiful brick building which he erected some three and a half years ago and in which he housed the post office. There are not many towns of this size that can boast of such a fine post office building.

Mr. Waterman's term expires on August 5th, at which time Mrs. Emma Gibbs takes over the duties of the office.

We beleive Mrs. Gibbs will also be an excellent official and should be able to handle the duties of Post Mistress in a most capable manner. She is a well educated lady and has been a successful teacher in our schools for a number of years. She is a pleasant lady in every way and we are sure that patrons of the post office will be pleased with her work.

We have not learned what Mr. Waterman expects to do, and perhaps he is undecided, but we would like to see him remain in Klemme as he is a good business man and very progressive and whenever he takes a hold of a business his first aim is to improve it to the highest standard and that has been the case while he was in business in his city, which is a long time.

Twenty infantry battalions, twelve squadrons of cavalry, ten batteries of artillery and five airplane escadrilles under the command of Gen. Poeymirau began an offensive against Mountain Taza, Morocco, on July 13. The losses for the last four days are said to have reached 2,000, but the French capital is not aware that the war is in progress.

The stifling heat of the last weekend compelled the government to cancel the huge military review it had planned in Paris, "on account of the heat," yet the Moroccan climate is admitted to be pretty warm even by the war department here.

The Moroccan forces are at Les Sidi Raho and Sidi Belkacj, under the direction of Abdul Malek. Malek's power has been growing three years, threatening the existence of the French empire in North Africa.

The war ministry ordered the war to be pushed southward in the summer, hoping to catch the Moors inactive.

The battleground lies north of the impassable mountain district of Taza.

German Resistance in the Ruhr Is Weakening, Report

Dusseldorf, July 21.—The German resistance in the Ruhr is weakening, according to opinions expressed by officers at French headquarters here. In support of their assertion they cite the fact that not a single act of sabotage has been reported within the last six days.

RECOGNITION OF MEXICO IS NEAR

United States May Take Action in Few Days, It Is Said.

ADVICES CALLED AUTHENTIC

Official Confirmation Is Withheld at Washington, but Atmosphere of Optimism Prevails at State Department There.

Washington, July 20.—American recognition of the Mexican government now headed by President Obregon appears to be close at hand, according to the authentic advices received here. Official confirmation was withheld, but the atmosphere of optimism prevailing at the State department served to substantiate the belief that the formal announcement of recognition might be expected within the next week or ten days.

Reports reaching here from Mexico City indicate that all differences between the Mexican and the American commissioners in the recognition conference have been settled to the satisfaction of both sides.

It is understood that only a few minor details of editing the text of the agreement remain to be settled.

The agreement necessarily must meet the approval of President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes, but the understandings arrived at by the American commissions, under the authority conferred upon them before they left, are expected to meet with satisfaction at Washington.

It is believed the final settlement was achieved by the acquiescence of the Mexican senate to amendments to the petroleum bill. These are:

1. Positive recognition of vested rights acquired previous to the promulgation of the 1917 constitution in accordance with judicial interpretation, as handed down in Supreme court decisions.

2. Substitution of denouncements for concessions open to public bid.

3. Time limit of surface owners to drill extended to five years.

4. Substitution of penalty clause for nonpayment of taxes of mining code for penalty clause in present bill.

Until they receive a formal report from the American commissioners, Charles B. Warren of Detroit and John Barton Payne of Chicago, State department officials are reluctant to discuss the reported settlement.

Demands $15,012,750 for Ear Cut Off in Row Over Woman

St. Louis, July 20.—Asserting that injuries he received in an attack made on him by M. C. Martin, London capitalist, have seriously impaired his earning capacity, James C. L. Huber, a promoter of New York and London, filed suit for $15,012,750 damages in Circuit court here. Huber declares that he is able to earn only a small salary now, while before the attack his income was $500,000 a year. The attack, Huber sets forth, was made in London last August 26. Martin, the promoter, he charges, cut off his right ear and threw acid in his face.

The lawyer filing the suit is C. E. Piper, who said the suit was filed here because Martin possesses a large sum of securities in Missouri, which is subject to attachment. Piper said the assault was the result of a quarrel over a woman. The petition asks $10,000,000 actual damages and $5,000,000 punitive damages.

WHO'S WHO in the WORLD

Sixty Years Old, but Earns His Wing

The army air service has added another world's record to its string of aeronautical accomplishments. Its chief, Maj. Gen. Mason M. Patrick, has qualified as a pilot.

General Patrick shattered the record when he won title to a set of silver wings, the official insignia of an air navigator in the United States aviation service, for he was on the verge of his sixtieth birthday. He stands today as the only major general in the American service who is a pilot. He is regarded as the oldest active flyer in the air service of any of the nations of the world.

General Patrick's feat of winning the coveted silver wings was accomplished through a keen desire he had, since assuming command of the air service in 1921, to meet all the requirements of the service. He officially declared an air pilot when he successfully completed a series of tests at Bolling Field in the presence of the examining board. The presentation of the set of silver wings was made to General Patrick at a luncheon given him by his associates in the air service at the Army and Navy club.

He modestly declared that his rating as a pilot was not sought for personal glory, but that his sole purpose in attempting to qualify was to get a better conception of the skill required in actual flying and in order that he might have a greater appreciation of the dangers incident to aerial navigation.

Meiklejohn Called a Fighting Liber

Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, whom the trustees of Amherst college forced to resign from the presidency of that institution, has been known for years as a fighting liberal in the educational field. At Brown university, where he was dean for eleven years before going to Amherst, he was called "the dean of the philosophic view."

Always he has preached the doctrine that what the world needs most is minds that can think clearly, and he has staunchly advocated, in a day of fads and electives, the old-fashioned system of "required" studies as being the curriculum tending best to produce such minds. Since the war, still maintaining his idea and strengthened in it by the catastrophe of 1914, he has declared, sometimes bitterly, that civilization cannot last with such soft thinking as the world has done in the past, and that the salvation of the human race depends upon education that really educates and that is not restricted to a favored few.

Dr. Meiklejohn of late has pointed out that colleges are too often for the favored minority and do not serve the public. He has maintained only trained and widespread intelligence would save the American democ experiment. "We are tired," he said recently, "of the world that gives things to the few."

C. P. Anderson Knows International L

Having devoted many years to the study of law and international diplomacy, and having acted as counselor of the State department, as an arbitrator of questions with Canada and as counsel for the United States before The Hague tribunal, there seems no doubt that Chandler Parsons Anderson is competent to fill the position to which he has been appointed—that of American member of the United States-German claims commission. He succeeds Judge Parker, who was made umpire of the negotiations.

He was born in 1866 at Lakeville, Conn. His early education was received at St. Paul's school and later at Yale university, from which he was graduated in 1887. The following year he entered Harvard law school and was admitted to the bar in 1890.

Mr. Anderson's record in the service of the government dates back to the middle nineties. He was secretary of the Behring Sea claims commission from 1896 to 1897. The following he represented the United States as secretary of the Anglo-American high commission for the settlement of Canadian questions.

DON'T KILL THE GOOSE THAT LAYS THE GOLDEN EGG

Ask some of your friends who patronize cream stations where no creamery is in competition with them what they think of the service and prices they are receiving.

Dairying is the main stay of this country, it produces greater profits, keeps your land in a high state of cultivation and is the means of enabling you to meet your current bills promptly and lay aside the money received from the sale of your hogs or cattle to either reduce your indebtedness or build up a bank account.

You wouldn't think of trading off a good, high grade milch cow for a non-producing scrub? Why not patronize and build up an institution that enables you to receive the very top prices for your dairy products rather than some corporation in which you have no interest?

SCARCITY OF TEACHERS

A scarcity of teachers is becoming evident according to a report of the bureau of appointments conducted by Grinnell college for the purpose of searching teaching positions for its graduates. One hundred and three requests for teachers have been received since January 1st the bureau reports. Of this number, bureau was able to supply fifty-nine with members of the June graduating class and twenty-one with alumni leaving twenty six positions unfilled. —Globe Gazette.

THE RIGHTS OF BOYHOOD.

There is nothing unworthyabout the mouth organ. It probably would be difficult to define a just reason for its general exclusion from or disapproval by musical circles. Some folk have been heard to condemn it as low; but it is low only in the sense that marbles and baseball are low. To some people an urchin bathing his heated frame in the primitive luxury of a swimming hole with out troubling about a bathing suit is low indeed. The sand lots are low, and all their works. Some folks are awfully strict.

The trade wishing to booster up the banished instrument renamed it harmonica. But the barmonica is a vastly different affair unless you are willing to affront the memory of Benjamin Franklin its inventor. Call a spade or a mouth organ by their right names, and then ask how many good citizens got their first practical introduction to music by that self same insiduous instrument The shamed answer of every truthful man would be legion.

Recently this orchestral device dedicated to boyhood to its belated own in a symphonic concert given at one of New York's fine motion pic ture houses, the solo vitruoso being a mouth organist. Richard Strauss, in one or more of his recent compositions, found that nothing but a cow bell could provide exactly the sound he wished to obtain. Now a cow bell does not compare with a mouth organ, any mre than cows compare with boys. And the mouth organ, so pecularily the medium of a boy's self expression has infinitely more capacity for music than the rattling "hot dog" ejaculations from the assorted hardware usually described as a jazz orchestra.

The mouth organ, the swimming hole, and the right of self-determination in the matter of fishing worms are all sturdy and necessary manifestations of boyhood. —Globe Gazette.

RUNNING THE RAILROAD

It is easy to find fault with the American railroad, for nothing is perfect and the theory that if the government takes them over their shortcomings will be cured because we, the people, will then run them without hindrance from Wall street or tribute to capital appeals to some minds. But the people of this great mid-Empire of the Mississippi valley, which has prospered under the system of private property and private initiative, would do well to compare our railroads, their service and their rates, with those of the state roads of Europe.

Euopean countries today are staggering under the burden of bureaucracy with its enormous army of state employes. That is what nationalization means, and we doubt if Americans want to adopt it. Politicians of the radical branch preach government ownership. Nationalization. because it means more power for themselves. But it would any sensible American think the politicians can run our railroads efficiently and economically? Nationalization means political manipulation and political manipulation means waste and inefficiency. It woud put a blight on American prosperity and especially the prosperity of the middle-west.—Chicago Tribune.

HUMAN INTEREST

(In Eagle Grove)

Applications for teaching positions ask much more information now than 15 years ago.

In the days of regular teachers, an applicant called on the board in person, was sized up in about five minutes and sent out on the next train, accepted or rejected. But now it is different.

Now a questionaire must be filled out which makes an income tax report look like a five minute copy book lesson.

The applicant must take stock and find out all about herself before she asks for the blank.

The following is a sample list of questions:

Have you ever been married, and why?

Do you want to get married? why?

Are you engaged?

What is the address and telephone number of your finance?

Do you have any reason to believe you will marry during the school year?

If you receive a proposal of marriage during the year will you accept?

Do you believe you will receive a proposal? When? Where?

If you should marry; will you keep the affair a secret or will you take the board into your confidence, both before and after.—From Eagle Grove.

The school house addition is progressing rapidly. Two coats of plaster have been put on and when dry the finishing carpenters will go to work. The plumbing is practically all roughed in and the electrical wiring finished to connections. It will be a fine building when finished.

Threshing season is now in full swing in this community and a half dozen or more rigs began work Monday in this vicinity. The grain is good and dry and threshing goes along fast this year.

Mrs. Lena Schroeder and daughter, Adela, returned Saturday morning from their trip to Tracy, Minn. They went with W. J. Barz and family, of Garner in their car and were away twelve days. They report a fine trip and a good time.

Klemme will have a filling station in the near future. Henry Lewis is putting up a filling station on his Main Street lot near the Northern Lumber Company and opposite the Ford Garage. He will handle the Standard Oil Co. products.

J. E. Kelly, former manager for the Swift & Co. station here moved to Belmond with his family last week and since that time about four different men have in charge of the station. It don't seem to pay out in this town. We understand the men work on a commission but can't make even a fair salary at it.

The watermelon season is again here. Last week melons were brot into town by truck from Mason City and sold by local merchants. The melons came from Georgia and were most delicious. We have also seen a number of fine water melon patches in this locality. We are going to keep an eye on them too.

Louie Knoke is back from a Mason City hospital where he had another operation on his arm which he injured in a Fourth of July accident about three years ago. He recently injured the arm and had to have another operation performed. He is sure having a lot of hard luck with it.

R. A. Jorgenson and family drove to Albert Lea, Minn., Sunday afternoon. The crops are badly in need of rain there and everything looked dry as a bone. Pastures were brown and some corn looked scorched. The Wilson Highway was taken up and the Jefferson back to Klemme, the former being the best.

Some of the Court House officials are enjoying vacations at the present time. Joe Knadler, deputy in the Clerk's office is in Chicago. Mr. John Suuiballe, treasurer, and family are on a tour; and Sup. Thos. Berhow and family and another party are touring the west. We had a post card from Tom mailed at Salt Lake City, Utah, and he said they were having a big time.

Postmaster J. W. Waterman was all swelled up like a poisoned pup Saturday and was viewing the world through one eye—the other being closed and out of business. We accused him of trying to lick a postage stamp, but it licked him. But John says he attended a bee demonstration near Garner last Friday and that a bee stung him. We wonder if the bee was demonstrating the latest model stinger on John's eyebrow?

Importance Of Cylinder Work

The CYLINDER is the "HEART OF THE ENGINE." It is the place where the greatest waste occurs and the most trouble originates. No matter how carefully other work may have been done, if the cylinders remain in their worn or scored condition the oil will leak by and the compession escape. The motor will remain weak and wasteful and will be noisy and unsatisfactory in the operation.

Without giving the matter much thought motor owners and some repairmen still attempt to correct these defects by installing new rings, but it must be remembered that rings cannot be made so they will prevent leakage in cylinders that have become worn out of round, scored or tapered, and reliable ring makers do not claim this of them.

The improvement noted in the motor after installing new rings is generally credited entirely to the rings. But, in fact, it is due largely to the removal of carbon, grinding of valves and general "tuning up" of the motor which always accompanies the installation of new rings. At best the improvement is only temporary and short-lived, and, therefore, expensive.

"Tapping-in" new oversized pistons without first machining or truing up the cylinder is a very slow and impractical process. Even where the wear is very slight the results obtained seldom justify the time and effort expended. It is absolutely impossible to lap out a scored, oval or tapered cylinder with the necessary degree of accuracy for perfect results. A new cylinder wall must be produced and STORMIZING is the most economical and practical method to accomplish this.

ow, Stillwell, out with it," she briefly.

al, Miss Majesty, there's goin' to fight somewhere, an' Stewart ed to get you-all in before it come He says the valley's overrun by eros an' guerrillas an' robbers, an' knows what else."

e stamped off the porch, his huge rs rattling, and started down the toward the waiting men.

ewart stood in his familiar attenposition, erect, silent, with a d on pommel and bridle.

Stewart, you are exceedingly—ghtful of my interests," she said, ting to thank him, and not readily ng words. "I would not know t to do without you. Is there dan-?"

'm not sure. But I want to be on safe side."

he hesitated. It was no longer easy her to talk to him, and she did not w why.

"May I know the special orders you e Nels and Nick and Monty?" she ed.

Of course I'll tell you if you insist. orders were that at least one of must be on guard near you day night—never to be out of hearing your voice."

I thought as much. Stewart, you think Don Carlos tried to make with me—may try it again?"

I don't think. I know."

And besides all your other duties have shared the watch with these e cowboys?"

Yes."

It has been going on without my owledge? How long is it to con-ue?"

That's hard to say. Till the revoion is over, anyhow."

he mused a moment, looking away the west, where the great void was ng with red haze. She believed imitly in him, and the menace hover- near her fell like a shadow upon present happiness.

What must I do?" she asked.

I think you ought to send your nds back East—and go with them, il this guerrilla war is over."

Why, Stewart, they would be ken-hearted, and so would I."

He had no reply for that.

If I do not take your advice it will the first time since I have come to k to you for so much," she went on. annot you suggest something else? friends are having such a splendid it. Helen is getting well. Oh, I uld be sorry to see them go before y want to."

We might take them up into the untains and camp out for a while," said, presently. "I know a wild ce up among the crags. It's a hard mb, but worth the work. I never w a more beautiful spot. Fine waand it will be cool. Pretty soon ll be too hot here for your party to out-of-doors."

You mean to hide me away among e crags and clouds?" replied Made-e, with a laugh.

Well, it'd amount to that. Your ends need not know. Perhaps in a w weeks this spell of trouble on the rder will be over till fall."

You say it's a hard climb up to this ce?"

It surely is. Your friends will get e real thing if they make that trip."

That suits me. Helen especially ants something to happen. Very ell, I am decided. Stewart, of course o will take charge? I don't believe Stewart, isn't there something re you could tell me—why you nk, why you know my own personal erty is in peril?"

Yes. But do not ask me what it is. I hadn't been a rebel soldier I would ver have known."

If you had not been a rebel soldier, here would Madeline Hammond be ow?" she asked, earnestly.

He made no reply.

"Stewart," she continued, with warm mpulse, "you once mentioned a debt ou owed me—" And seeing his dark e pale, she wavered, then went on. t is paid."

"No, no. That never can be paid."

Madeline held out her hand.

"It is paid, I tell you," she repeated.

Suddenly he drew back from the outstretched white hand that seemed fascinate him.

"I'd kill a man to touch your hand. t I won't touch it on the terms you e."

His unexpected passion disconcerted er.

"Stewart, no man ever before reused to shake hands with me, for any reason. It—it is scarcely flattering," she said, with a little laugh. "Why won't you? Because you think I offer as mistress to servant—rancher to owboy?"

"No."

"Then why? The debt you owed me paid. I cancel it. So why not shake nds upon it, as men do?"

"I won't. That's all."

"I fear you are ungracious, whatever your reason," she replied. "Still, I may offer it again some day. Good-night."

He said good-night and turned. Madeline wonderingly watched him go down the path with his hand on the black horse's neck.

She went in to rest a little before dressing for dinner and, being fatigued from the day's riding and excitement, she fell asleep. When she awoke it was twilight. She wondered why her Mexican maid had not come to her, and she rang the bell. The maid did not put in an appearance, nor was there any answer to the ring. The house seemed unusually quiet. It was a brooding silence, which presently broke to the sound of footsteps on the porch. Madeline recognized Stillwell's tread, though it appeared to be light for him. Then she heard him call softly in at the open door of her office. The suggestion of caution in his voice suited the strangeness of his walk. With a boding sense of trouble she hurried through the rooms. He was standing outside her office door.

"Stillwell!" she exclaimed.

"Please come out on the porch."

She complied and, once out, was enabled to see him. His grave face, paler than she had ever beheld it, caused her to stretch an appealing hand toward him. Stillwell intercepted it and held it in his own.

"Miss Majesty, I'm amazin' sorry to tell worrisome news. But it can't be avoided. The fact is we're in a bad fix. If your guests ain't scared out of their skins it'll be owin' to your nerve an' how you carry out Stewart's orders."

"You can rely upon me," replied Madeline, firmly, though she trembled.

"Wal, what we're up against is this: that gang of bandits Pat Hawe was chasin'—they're hidin' in the house!"

"In the house?" echoed Madeline, aghast.

"Miss Majesty, it's the amazin' truth, an' shamed indeed am I to admit it. Stewart—why, he's wild with rage to think it could hev happened. You see, it couldn't hev happened if I hedn't sloped the boys off to the gol-lof links, an' if Stewart hedn't rid out on the mesa after us. It's my fault. But now we've got to face it—to figger. Now, listen. When Stewart left you an hour or so ago he follered me direct to where me an' the boys was tryin' to keep Pat Hawe from tearin' the ranch to pieces. At that we was helpin' Pat all we could to find them bandits. But when Stewart got there he made a difference. Pat was nasty before, but seein' Stewart made him wuss. I reckon Gene to Pat is the same as red to a Greaser bull. Anyway, when the sheriff set fire to an old adobe hut Stewart called him an' called him hard. Pat Hawe hed six fellers with him, an' from all appearances bandit-huntin' was some fiesta. There was a row, an' it looked bad fer a little. But Gene was cool, an' he controlled the boys. Then Pat an' his tough de-pooties went on huntin'. That huntin', Miss Majesty, petered out into what was only a farce.

"In the House?" Echoed Madeline, Aghast.

Pat Hawe wasn't lookin' hard fer any bandits; he wasn't daid set huntin' anythin', unless it was trouble fer Stewart. Finally, when Pat's men made fer our storehouse, where we keep ammunition, grub, liquors, an' sich, then Gene called a halt. An' he ordered Pat Hawe off the ranch. It was hyar Hawe an' Stewart locked horns. An' hyar the truth come out. There was a gang of bandits hid somewheres, an' at fust Pat Hawe hed been powerful active an' earnest in his huntin'. But suddenlike he'd fetched a pe-coolier change of heart. He had been some flustered with Stewart's eyes a-pryin' into his moves, an' then, mebbe to hide somethin', mebbe jest nat'rul, he got mad. He hollered law. He pulled down off the shelf his old stock grudge on Stewart, accusin' him over again of that Greaser murder last fall. Stewart made him look like a fool—showed him up as bein' scared of the bandits or hevin' some reason fer slopin' off the trail. Anyway, the row started all right, an' it might hev amounted to a fight. In the thick of it, when Stewart was drivin' Pat an' his crowd off the place, one of them de-pooties lost his head an' went fer his gun. Nels throwed his gun an' crippled the feller's arm. Monty jumped then an' throwed two forty-fives, an' fer a second or so it looked ticklish. But the bandit-hunters crawled, an' then lit out."

Stillwell paused in the rapid delivery of his narrative; he still retained Madeline's hand, as if by that he might comfort her.

"After Pat left we put our haids together," began the old cattleman, with a long respiration. "We rounded up a lad who had seen a dozen or so fellers—he wouldn't say they was Greasers—breakin' through the shrubbery to the back of the house. That was while Stewart was ridin' out to the mesa. Then this lad seen your servants all runnin' down the hill toward the village. Now, heah's the way Gene figgers. There sure was some deviltry down along the railroad, an' Pat Hawe trailed bandits up to the ranch. He hunts hard an' then all to onct he quits. Stewart says Pat Hawe wasn't scared, but he discovered signs of somethin', or got wind in some strange way that there was in the gang of bandits some fellers he didn't want to ketch. Sabe? Then Gene, quicker'n a flash, springs his plan on me. He'd go down to Padre Marcos an' hev him help to find out all possible from your Mexican servants. I was to hurry up hyar an' tell you—give you orders, Miss Majesty. Ain't that amazin' strange? Wal, you're to assemble all your guests in the kitchen. Make a grand bluff an' pretend, as your help has left, that it'll be great fun fer your guests to cook dinner. The kitchen is the safest room in the house. While you're joshin' your party along, makin' a kind of picnic out of it, I'll place cowboys in the long corridor, an' also outside in the corner where the kitchen joins on to the main house. It's pretty sure the bandits think no one's wise to where they're hid. Stewart says they're in that end room where the alfalfa is, an' they'll slope in the night. Of course, with me an' the boys watchin', you-all will be safe to go to bed. An' we're to rouse your guests early before daylight, to hit the trail up into the mountains. Tell them to pack outfits before goin' to bed. Say as your servants hev sloped, you might as well go campin' with the cowboys. That's all. If we hev any luck your friends'll never know they've been sittin' on a powder-mine. Now, Miss Majesty, I've used up a lot of time explainin'. You'll sure keep your nerve?"

"Yes," Madeline replied, and was surprised at herself.

"Better tell Florence. She'll be a power of comfort to you. I'm goin' now to fetch up the boys."

Instead of returning to her room Madeline went through the office into the long corridor. It was almost as dark as night. She fancied she saw a slow-gliding figure darker than the surrounding gloom; and she entered upon the fulfillment of her part of the plan in something like trepidation. Her footsteps were noiseless. Finding the door to the kitchen, and going in, she struck lights. Upon passing out again she made certain she discerned a dark shape, now motionless, crouching along the wall. But she mistrusted her vivid imagination. It took all her boldness to enable her unconcernedly and naturally to strike the corridor light. Then she went on through her own rooms and thence into the patio.

Her guests laughingly and gladly entered into the spirit of the occasion. They trooped merrily into the kitchen. Madeline, delaying at the door, took a sharp but unobtrusive glance down the great, barnlike hall. She saw nothing but blank dark space. Suddenly from one side, not a rod distant, protruded a pale, gleaming face breaking the even blackness. Instantly it flashed back out of sight. Yet that time was long enough for Madeline to see a pair of glittering eyes, and to recognize them as Don Carlos'.

Without betraying either hurry or alarm, she closed the door. It had a heavy bolt which she slowly, noiselessly shot. Then the cold amaze that had all but stunned her into inaction throbbed into wrath. How dared that Mexican steal into her home! What did he mean? Was he one of the bandits supposed to be hidden in her house? She was thinking herself into greater anger and excitement, and probably would have betrayed herself had not Florence, who had evidently seen her bolt the door and now read her thoughts, come toward her with a bright, intent, questioning look. Madeline caught herself in time.

Thereupon she gave each of her guests a duty to perform. Leading Florence into the pantry, she unburdened herself of the secret in one brief whisper. Florence's reply was to point out of the little open window, passing which was a file of stealthily moving cowboys. Then Madeline lost both anger and fear, retaining only the glow of excitement.

The miscellaneous collection of dishes so confusingly contrived made up a dinner which they all heartily enjoyed. Madeline enjoyed it herself, even with the feeling of a sword hanging suspended over her.

The hour was late when she rose from the table and told her guests to go to their rooms, don their riding-clothes, pack what they needed for the long and adventurous camping trip that she hoped would be the climax of their western experience, and to snatch a little sleep before the cowboys roused them for the early start.

Madeline went immediately to her room, and was getting out her camping apparel when a knock interrupted her.

"Who's there?" she questioned.

"Stewart," came the reply.

She opened the door. He stood on the threshold.

"May I speak to you?" he asked.

"Certainly." She hesitated a moment, then asked him in and closed the door. "Is—is everything all right?"

"No. These bandits stick to cover pretty close. They must have found out we're on the watch. But I'm sure we'll get you and your friends away before anything starts."

"Do you have any idea who is hiding in the house?"

"I was worried some at first. Pat Hawe acted queer. I imagined he'd discovered he was trailing bandits who might turn out to be smuggling guerrilla cronies. But talking with your servants, finding a bunch of horses hidden down in the mesquite behind the pond—several things have changed my mind. My idea is that a cowardly handful of riffraff outcasts from the border have hidden in your house, more by accident than design. We'll let them go—get rid of them without even a shot. If I didn't think so—well, I'd be considerably worried. It would make a different state of affairs."

"Stewart, you are wrong. I saw one of these bandits. I distinctly recognized him."

One long step brought him close to her.

"Who was he?" demanded Stewart.

"Don Carlos."

He muttered low and deep, then said, "Are you sure?"

"Absolutely. I saw his figure twice in the hall, then his face in the light. I could never mistake his eyes."

Madeline was tremblingly conscious that Stewart underwent a transformation. She saw as well as felt the leaping passion that changed him.

"Call your friends—get them in here!" he ordered, tersely, and wheeled toward the door.

"Stewart, wait!" she said.

He turned. His white face, his burning eyes, his presence now charged with definite, fearful meaning, influenced her strangely, weakened her.

"What will you do?" she asked.

"That needn't concern you. Get your party in here. Bar the windows and lock the doors. You'll be safe."

"Stewart! Tell me what you intend to do."

"I won't tell you," he replied, and turned away again.

"But I will know," she said. With a hand on his arm she detained him. She saw how he halted—felt the shock in him as she touched him. "Oh, I do know. You mean to fight!"

"Well, Miss Hammond, isn't it about time?" he asked. There was weariness, dignity, even reproof in his question. "The fact of that Mexican's presence here in your house ought to prove to you the nature of the case. These vaqueros, these guerrillas, have found out you won't stand for any fighting on the part of your men. Don Carlos is a sneak, a coward, yet he's not afraid to hide in your own house. He has learned you won't let your cowboys hurt anybody. He's taking advantage of it. He'll rob, burn, and make off with you. He'll murder, too, if it falls his way. These Greasers use knives in the dark. So I ask—isn't it about time we stop him?"

"Stewart, I forbid you to fight, unless in self-defense. I forbid you."

"What I mean to do is self-defense. Haven't I tried to explain to you that just now we've wild times along this stretch of border? Must I tell you again that Don Carlos is hand and glove with the revolution? The rebels are crazy to stir up the United States. You are a woman of prominence. Don Carlos would make off with you. If he got you, what little matter to cross the border with you! Well, where would the hue and cry go? Through the troops along the border! To New York! To Washington! Why, it would mean what the rebels are working for—United States intervention. In other words, war!"

"Oh, surely you exaggerate!" she cried.

"Maybe so. But I'm beginning to see the Don's game. And, Miss Hammond, it's awful for me to think what you'd suffer if Don Carlos got you over the line. I know these low-caste Mexicans. I've been among the peons—the slaves."

"Stewart, don't let Don Carlos get me," replied Madeline, in sweet directness

She saw him shake, saw his throat swell as he swallowed hard, saw the hard fierceness return to his face.

"I won't. That's why I'm going after him."

"But I forbade you to start a fight deliberately."

"Then I'll go ahead and start one without your permission." He shook off her hand and strode forward.

"Please, don't go!" she called, beseechingly. But he kept on. "Stewart!"

She ran ahead of him, intercepted him, faced him with her back against the door. He swept out a long arm as if to brush her aside. But it wavered and fell. Haggard, troubled, with working face, he stood before her.

"It's for your sake," he expostulated. "Let me out, Miss Hammond. I'm going to take the boys and go after these guerrillas."

"No!"

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Stewart. "Why not let me go? It's the thing to do. I'm sorry to distress you and your guests. Why not put an end to Don Carlos' badgering? Is it because you're afraid a rumpus will spoil your friends' visit?"

"It isn't—not this time."

"Then it's the idea of a little shooting at these Greasers?"

"No."

"You're sick to think of a little Greaser blood staining the halls of your home?"

"No."

"Well, then, why keep me from doing what I know is best?"

"Stewart, I—I—" she faltered, in growing agitation. "I'm frightened—confused. All this is too—too much for me. I'm not a coward. If you have to fight you'll see I'm not a coward. But your way seems so reckless—that hall is so dark—the guerrillas would shoot from behind doors. You're so wild, so daring, you'd rush right into peril. Is that necessary? I think—I mean—I don't know just why I feel so—so about you doing it. But I believe it's because I'm afraid you—you might be hurt."

"You're afraid I—I might be hurt?" he echoed, wonderingly, the hard whiteness of his face warming, flushing, glowing.

"Yes."

The single word, with all it might mean, with all it might not mean, softened him as if by magic, made him gentle, amazed, shy as a boy, stifling under a torrent of emotions.

Madeline thought she had persuaded him—worked her will with him. Then another of his startlingly sudden moves told her that she had reckoned too quickly. This move was to put her firmly aside so he could pass; and Madeline, seeing he would not hesitate to lift her out of the way, surrendered the door. He turned on the threshold. His face was still working, but the flame-pointed gleam of his eyes indicated the return of that cowboy ruthlessness.

"I'm going to drive Don Carlos and his gang out of the house," declared Stewart. "I think I may promise you to do it without a fight. But if it takes a fight, off he goes!"

CHAPTER XIV

The Mountain Trail.

As Stewart departed from one door Florence knocked upon another; and Madeline, far shaken out of her usual serenity, admitted the cool western girl with more than gladness. Just to have her near helped Madeline to get back her balance. She was conscious of Florence's sharp scrutiny, then of a sweet, deliberate change of manner. Florence might have been burning with curiosity to know more about the bandits hidden in the house, the plans of the cowboys, the reason for Madeline's suppressed emotion; but instead of asking Madeline questions she introduced the important subject of what to take on the camping trip. For an hour they discussed the need of this and that article, selected those things most needful, and then packed them in Madeline's duffle-bags.

That done, they decided to lie down, fully dressed as they were in riding-costume, and sleep, or at least rest, the little remaining time left before the call to saddle. Madeline turned out the light and, peeping through her window, saw dark forms standing sentinel-like in the gloom. When she lay down she heard soft steps on the path. This fidelity to her swelled her heart, while the need of it presaged that fearful something which, since Stewart's passionate appeal to her, haunted her as inevitable.

Madeline did not expect to sleep, yet she did sleep, and it seemed to have been only a moment until Florence called her. She followed Florence outside. She could discern saddled horses being held by cowboys. There was an air of hurry and mystery about the departure. Helen, who came tiptoeing out with Madeline's other guests, whispered that it was like an escape. She was delighted. The others were amused. To Madeline it was indeed an escape. She heard low voices, the champing of bits and thumping of hoofs, and she recognized Stewart when he led up Majesty for her to mount. Then came a pattering of soft feet and the whining of dogs. Cold noses touched her hands, and she saw the long, gray, shaggy shapes of her pack of Russian wolf-hounds. That Stewart meant to let them go with her was indicative of how he studied her pleasure. She loved to be out with the hounds and her horse.

Signs of Wisdom.

These are the signs of a wise man: to reprove nobody, to praise nobody; to blame nobody, nor even to speak of himself or his own merits.—Epictetus.

LEGION MAN IN HIGH COURT

Royal A. Stone, Minnesota, Who Saw Long Service, Named Associate Justice of Supreme Court.

Despite continued disappointments in earlier life, Royal A. Stone, an active member of the American Legion, has been named as associate justice of the Minnesota Supreme court. Justice Stone's uphill fight to this position marks his career as one of the most interesting in the Northwest.

It seemed that every possible hindrance was thrown in his way in earlier years, beginning with his matriculation as a law student at the University of Minnesota. Crop conditions brought heavy financial loss to his father so that the lad was forced to relinquish the college course to enter the office of an attorney to complete law work. His subsequent struggle for a living in a small town where ten other attorneys were practicing made it hard going.

His first trial, in defense of an alleged murderer, brough another disappointment. About this time the Maine was blown to atoms in Havana harbor and the country was stirred with appeals for men. Stone was anxious to go, but he could not desert his client. At length, the trial was over, however, and he was on his way to Georgia as a private in a Minnesota Guard unit.

Following discharge from service he made rapid strides in his profession. In 1904 he was named as assistant attorney general, continuing in this post until 1907, when he resigned to enter law practice in St. Paul.

The United States then entered the World war. Despite his age of forty-two years the Minnesotan made application to the first officers' training camp and there received a commission as captain. He was assigned to Camp Dodge, where he took command of Company A, Three Hundred and Forty-ninth infantry. Here his "jinx" bobbed up again. Captain Stone was eager to get to France, but on the eve of sailing an order came through making him a major and transferring him to the command of training troops. This, he says, was his last "disappointment." He remained at Camp Dodge until the armistice was signed, after which he was transferred to the inspector general's department. He left the service in July, 1919. Still a member of the reserve, Major Stone is inspector of the Eighty-eighth "paper" division.

His appointment to the highest court of the state is said by his comrades in the Legion to have been a fitting recognition of ability. Justice Stone has continued his work as a trial lawyer, and his choice by the governor has taken him from the rough-and-tumble of the courtroom to the judicial sedateness of the Supreme bench.

He is a member of St. Paul post No. 8 of the American Legion, which counts on its roster many men of Minnesota prominent in state, county and municipal affairs.

OWSLEY HONORED BY FRENCH

Award of Order of Merit of Union Nationale des Combattants to National Commander.

Alvin Owsley, national commander of the American Legion, has received the award of the Order of Merit of the Union Nationale des Combattants, composed of more than a million French veterans of the World war. Only fifty other men have been awarded this decoration.

Presentation was made by Charles Bertrand, secretary of the French organization, who was named president of the Interallied Veterans' federation at its last gathering in New Orleans. The latter organization, which represents fifteen million veterans of allied forces, has begun to wield considerable power in international affairs. The American Legion is the member body in this country.

The decoration is in the form of a handsome bronze medal, suspended from a green bar with a ribbon of the French society's colors. Accompanying the medal, as a personal memento from M. Bertrand, was a bronze plaque, indicating his unalterable affection for Commander Owsley and the American Legion.

Texas Post Gives Concerts.

Regular weekly concerts by members of the American Legion have been given by the Paris (Tex.) post of the organization for a period of nearly nine months. Legion artists have visited smaller nearby communities to present special musical programs, and weekly concerts have been given in the city. Recently the artists gave a complete program which was broadcast from a well known radio station. The post maintains a band, an orchestra, a drum corps and a quartet. Further service is rendered the community by a free medical clinic established for the poor by the Legion men.

This locality is experiencing a lot of hot, dry weather. Sunday was perhaps the hottest day this year. The thermometer registered 98 degrees at 2:00 o'clock, official weather reports say. A hot wind was also blowing, which made it worse. A good, heavy rain would do a lot of good as pastures are very dry. The corn is not hurt yet but needs rain soon.

LAWHORN FARM DESTROYED BY FIRE MONDAY NIGHT

HOUSE WAS ONLY BUILDING TO BE SAVED BY QUICK ACTION

Origin Of Big Fire Unknown Here; Third Large Fire In This Vicinity

A destructive fire practically wiped out the Charles Lawhorn farm, 4 miles northeast of Klemme Monday night at about 9:30 o'clock and burning for several hours. Charlie lost every building on the farm except the house, which was saved only through the efforts of neighbors who formed a bucket brigade and kept the house soaked with water.

Mr. Lawohrn and family had retired at about nine o'clock; but before going to bed Charlie went to the barn and everything was alright for the night. Shortly after getting in bed he heard a commotion in the barn as though the horses were kicking. Looking out the window he saw the barn in a solid mass of fire. He himself and his son tried to get the horses out but could not get in, and Mrs. Lawhorn called for help over the phone.

The fire consumed his large barn, 36x60, including his hay crop and straw in the loft, five head of horses and a couple of calves, all the harness and other articles. A new hog house also went up in flames, as well as the grainery and corn crib. 600 bushels of corn and 700 bushels of oats were lost. The chicken shed and some chickens were burned. A machine shed and a quantity of machinery was also destroyed, as well as other farming tools. The car was saved.

Fences were also broken down by the stock escaping from the scene of the fire and it was difficult to get a check on the stock lost.

Mr. Lawhorn carried some insurance, but not enough to cover his great loss and it is a hard blow as his grain crop is also lost, besides the buildings and other items.

Several large fires have broken out on farms during the past few weeks, and in each case the origin is unknown A like fire recently occurred near Forest City and another northeast of Garner.

WATCHING THE PARADE

By John Pilgrim

When my old man used to take me out to weed the onion bed, which he did, being an incredibly hard-hearted old monster, who was not en rapport with the modern theory that the child should do no work, I used to try to curl as close to the onion roots as possible, I tried to make it easy.

"Stand up," my old man would roar. "Keep your knees stiff. Bend from the waist."

"But that's so hard." Id' whine.

"There is no easy way of doing work," my old man always said.

He was wrong of course. I have't a bit of doubt that the modern farmer puts a weedy onion bed in the end of a machine and takes out a check, minus broker's commission. If any, at the other. There are plenty of easy ways of doing work. However, as I grow older I begin to get an idea of what my old man was driving at. He always held that the first thing to consider was to get the work done. The man or boy who thinks first of comfort when on a job is not apt to win any medals for the way he does it.

There is a psyschological fact to be considered in this matter of being over-easy with one's self. If you plunge at your work with the idea of getting it done, it melts away, somehow. It doesn't bother a bit. Before you know it your out of the sun. You have even enjoyed getting that savl age job by the back of the neck and shaking its back teeth like castanets. The work has been done better, too. The nails have been driven deeper, the customer has been made certain, the patient has been made to feel your own current of vital energy.

But if you try to weed an onion bed sitting down, Heaven help the onions!

OBITUARY — MARION ELDER

Marion Elder, the son of George and Emily Elder was born at Clearfield, Penn., March 31, 1856.

At the age of nine years he moved to Hancock County, Iowa with his parents. Here he grew to manhood, doing much for the then sparsely settled country.

On December 23. 1877, he was united in marriage to Miss Hattie Robbins at Garner, Iowa. They lived in various places for a time and finally settled on a farm southeast of Klemme, Iowa.

To this union four children, three sons and one daughter, were born; Clarence, who died in childhood; George R. now residing at Eagle Bend, Minn. ; Ralph W., of Klemme, Iowa; and Mrs. Edward Palmby of Vernon Center, Minn.

In 1916 he moved, with his wife, to Eagle Bend, Minn., where he resided until his death.

He died at the home of his daughter, near Vernon Center, on July 27, 1923, at the age of 67 years, 3 months and 27 days, after an illness of about two years.

He leaves to mourn his death his devoted wife, three children, six grandchildren, six brothers, three sisters and a great host of other relatives and friends.

His quiet manner, his good opinion and advice, which he was always ready to give when it was asked for, has made him a great throng of friends, who will never forget him.

He was above all a loyal American citizen. He was a member of both the Woodman and Odd Fellow lodges.

He was man of sterling character, being a most devoted husband, a kind father, a true friend and throu all his illness a most patient sufferer.

Funeral services were held Sunday at Vernon Center, and burial made in the Vernon Center cemetary.

KNOWING THE LANGUAGE

How Large is Your Vocabulary? Can You Use the English Language Fluently

Milton used 13,000 different word in his writings. Shakespeare used 20,000—perhaps more than that. The English language contains twice as many words now as it did in Shakespeare's time. but even at that it is surprising to learn from Dr. Frank Vizetelly, managing editor of the New Standard dictionary, that Woodrow Wilson's writings contain 60,000 words.

In seventy-five speeches addressed to the people of the Uuited States between 1913 and 1918, the president used only 6,221 different words. Yet in his three works "The State," "Congressional Government, and the "History of the United States," he uses almost ten times that many.

The English farmhand is said to use only 300 words or so. The American working man, who reads a few newspapers. commands from 700 to 1,000 words. The average middle class American reads and understands the meaning of from 8,000 to10,000 words, and uses, probably half that many.

The average man's vocabulary could be much enlarged without adding big or unusual words to it. Often we use one word for half a dozen shades of meaning, when there are words for each meaning which would make our speech more concise, and fresher. It is a mistake to think our language, grown to twice its size in a century or two, is made up of a group of simple usable words and a great mass of difficult words of no value to the average man. The language is full of words seldom used, it is true, but if one were to master only the simple, usable words of three syllables and less and to use them in writing and speaking he would have a vocabulary bigger than Shakespeare's or Milton's.

Dr. Missman and familiy spent Sunday visiting at Belmond.

MOW FIRES PREVENABLE

Spontaneous Combustion Due to Improper Curing.

Most of the losses due to spontaneous combustion are avoidable, in the opinion of A. R. Lamb of the chemistry section, Iowa Agricultural Experiment Station. "They may be prevented," he says, "by intelligent care and precaution based on an understanding of what spontaneous combustion is and how it is likely to act.

'Clover and alfalfa hays are most liable to spontaneous combustion, due probably to the fact that the stems do not dry out as easily as do the grasses. As far as is known, only three conditions are necessary to cause a fire of this origin .There must be moisture in the hay, great enough bulk to retain the heat generated and sufficient ventilation to supply the necessary oxygen."

According to Mr. Lamb, the combustion or burning is very slow at first. If the small amount of heat generated by this burning does not all escape the rate of combustion increases until the point of ignition is reached. When this occurs the material actually bursts into flame. The most common cases are with hay and coal.

In order to avoid trouble from fires started by spontaneous combustion, the first precaution is to see that the hay is well cured before storing If for any cause hay has to be mowed while damp, the first evidence of heating is shown in the morning, when the mow is covered with moisture condensed from the water vapor driven off in heating. Craters or openings near the center will appear if the heating continues. If the gases or pungent odors are given off, the heating has reached a dangerous stage and should be removed at once.

You look tired this morning. Bill,' said the head bookkeeper to one of the office clerks. Don't you sleep well?"

"No. My wife and I suffer from alternate insommia."

"Alternate insommia! What is it? Whichever gets to sleep first keeps the other awake all night."

SILAGE NEEDED IN SUMMER

Keeps Milk Production Up, Declares Diarymen.

"Silage was never more needed than during the hot, dry spell which has been prevalent in this section recently," a member of an Iowa Cow testing association said the other day in a letter to the agricultural exension service of the Iowa State College.

"Those who have been feeding to offset this unfavorable condition have not had such marked decreases in production as those who have relied entirely on pasture."

Moral, see you county agent and have him explain a good ration for dry weather feeding of dairy cows for milk production. Then look into the advantages of the silo, which are many.

CHICAGO TO TEACH HER YOUTH TO FLY

CHICAGO: (United Press) The Air Board of Chicago believes that the airplane will be as common as automobiles in ten years and in Aug ust will open a flying school for boys and girls.

The youngsters will be instructed in flying and building model airplanes. Terrence Vincent, director of McKinley park, Chicago, will be in charge. Several playgrounds arganizations and a yacht cub will cooperate.

"The youngsters will learn fundamental scientific facts about aviation," Vincine said. "This will be through work with models. Since most of us will fly to and from our vacations—maybe to and from our work—in ten years, it is well that we so teach boys and girls who will be the users of airplanes.

Girls make just as good pilots as men and are equally skillful in modeling planes, Vincent asserted.

Well, Did He?

A convict being led to the gallows paused to thank prison officials and his lawyer for kindness shown. He then turned to the attending minister and said: "I will see you later."

Important Business Deal Transacted Here Yesterday

DR. R. M. THOMAS SELLS OUT VETERINARY PRACTICE TO DR. ANDERSON

Dr. Thomas Appointed Veterinarian For Insurance Company

A business transaction took place yesterday, August 1st, when Dr. R. M. Thomas sold out his large veterinary practice in this community to Dr. D. P. Anderson.

The deal came as a surprise to everybody here as it was thought that "Tommy" was a permanent fixture, we might say, and has built up a large, fine business during his nine years of residence here. But Dr. Thomas's close friends knew he would make the change months ago. This important change all came about because Dr. Thomas had been selected from a long list of able veterinarians by the Mutual Live Stock Insurance Company, of Des Moines, to act in the capacity as their company veterinarian. This appointment carries with it a most desirable salary as well as prestage. Dr. and Mrs. Thomas and children will remain here but a short time as his new work demands a more central location in the state.

Dr. Thomas has resided here nine years. He answered the call to the Colors and spent 21 months in service over seas as a First Lieut. in the Veterinary Corps. He gained a lot of experience over-seas which helped him qualify, in a measure, for the position he now has.

In regard to the second party of the transaction, Dr. D. P. Anderson, we might say that he needs no introduction as he is well known here by this time. He has been here for about two months and is doing a good practice and is well liked by all who have met him. With the addition of Dr. Thomas' practice added to his own, Dr. Anderson will have a most desirable practice.

RAIN CAME IN TIME TO BENEFIT CROPS IN THIS VICINITY

HUMBOLDT OIL WELL

Humboldt Independent:—Matters of the Humboldt Oil & Developement Company have been comingon rather slowly for a time, yet steady and satisfactory to all concerned.

The matter of securing sufficient leases on land in the vicinity to warrant the drilling of the test well has been the work of the company for the past couple of weeks. It was necessary to have a reasonable percentage of the land in the territory leased before it would pay to put down a well. While the amount needed has not been actually signed up, they feel that enough has been secured to warrant the making of a provisional contract for drilling, which they have done, and the machinery will be shipped here this week and will be ready to set up and start work as soon as the required leased are signed up.

The holes will be started at 16 inches and Thorpe Bros. who have the contract, say they are prepared to go down till they either strike oil or bring up hair on the auger if necessary. The Thorpe Bros. are experienced drillers and they are to put an expert man from the oil fields in charge of the drilling.

That Humboldt will soon experience the thrill of drilling for oil is now assured and may we all hope that the experiment will prove to be a profitable one. Is it not worth the effort anyway?

FORESTS NEARING EXHAUSTION

Lumber production in the United States has been steadily decreasing for thirteen years, and this in the face of a need unparrelled in the history of the country. According to a bulletin just published by the U. S. department of Agriculture of 37 eastern states, 36 showed a decreased cut an only one a slight increased in 1920; while Pacific slope states all report substantial increases showing the the center of production is shifting to the western states the last of our soft wood reserves

Thirty years ago after the depletion of New York, and Pennsylvania white pine sections, the American lumber market was drawing its supply from Great Lake states. When the sources in those sections became exhausted and the forests no longer able to supply the demand or furnish enough to keep the mills in operation, the industry moved to the southern line region, and is rapidly duplicating the same proceedure there . The inevtable result follows that within the near future we shall be wholly dependent upon this reserve of all-purpose soft-woods, the Pacific slope. Not only is this the only remaining domestic source of softwoods, but a recent survey of the world's supply of this commodity discloses the fact that there are no foreign forests of this character that we may draw on when our own are exhausted. These figures and facts suggest several questions that touch the welfare of every individual in our growing population. What will be the effect when our timber is gone? What will be the several stages of adjustment? What steps should be taken to meet the naional needs? What is being done in this respect?

The average rate of decrease over the last 13 years has been about two per cent year. The figures for 1920 are about 27 per cent lower than the high production peak that was reached in 1907, when we produced about 46 billion feet. We have passed the high point and the present tendency downward is permanent. Since this is the case there must be some active steps taken to insure permanent local sources of timber for the future.

When we were young, just starting out in the world, we were told that making the first thousand dollars was the hardest. Now they tell us that the first million is the hardest.

Maybe Henry Ford could get a lot more votes for President if he changed the shape of the hoods and tonneaus and painted them some other shade of black.

RAIN YESTERDAC CAME JUST IN TIME TO DO A LOT OF GOOD HERE

Corn And Pastures Were Burning Up From Continued Dry Spell In This Locality

The rainless, burning dry spell, lasting several weeks, was finally broken yesterday, when a rain began to descend early in the morning. At daylight it could be seen that the rain had done a lot of good; the dry ground was thoroughly soaked for the first time in over four weeks. A little water sttod in pools here and there which showed that the rain had been fairly heavy. Later thru the day rain fell quietly and with the cool weather will mean many dollars to farmers in this locality.

Small Grain Good

Threshing has been going on here for over a week now.

Farmers report that the average yield for oats here is about thirty-five bushels to the acre. Of course there are fields where the yield is forty to fifty bushels or even better but this is an exception. Oats is of a good quality here and over-runs by weight.

Due to the dry weather the straw was good and dry and the shocks in fine shape for threshing and it did not take long to thresh out a large field this year, so that a lot of time was gained his year in threshing.

Corn Will Be Good

We have an excellent stand of corn here and the big fields of corn looked fine up to a week or so ago when the continued dry weather and hot days began to take effect on the corn. In some places the corn is burnt, but this only in spots in the fields. Corn has not been hurt a great deal around Klemme and the rain we had will bring it out in fine shape. The rain came just in the nick of time to do the corn good.

Pastures Are Dried Up

Pastures have suffered here and are dried up and brown. The rain will perhaps bring them back to a state of greeness again so they will be of some value as feed to cattle. The dry pastures has made a noticable slump in the amount of butterfat sold to the creamery as the cows did not do so well on the dry pastures. Plenty of rain will bring the dairying up to standard production again.

Gardens Also Slow

Gardens suffered with the rest of the world around here during the prolonged drought. The dryness was especially noticable with sweet-corn and cucumbers. The sweet corn crop is rather slim and many gardeners were out of luck to eat it "on the cob." Little Willie will not have his usual fill of pickles this year as the cucumber crop suffered a lot.

The top of the Chicago cattle market July 25 was scored by 20 Hereford steers from the feedlots of C. H. Mulholland of Kanawha. The $11.40 price was fifteen cents above any other sale made on the same day. and sixty-five cents higher than the bulk of the transactions which ranged from $8.75 to $10.75 a hundredweight.

According to the selling agents, the Hereford's were bought at one of the river markets at a figure which gave a very satisfactory margin. They were western branded and had made the excellent gains characteristic of "whitefaces". Scaled at Chicago, the 20 head averaged 1328 pounds each.

Sales such as Mr. Mulholland's are putting dollars in the pockets of Hancock County's feeders these days.

Ain't It the Truth?

Fannie: " What's the matter now?"

BERLIN FEARS RED UPRISING

Members of Municipal Council Ask Help From Federal Government.

PREDICT LOOTING BY MOBS

Food Supply Collapse Closes Many Shops as Crowds Besiege Markets — Purses Stuffed With Marks Which Are of No Value.

Berlin, July 28.—With thousands of shops closed, the city almost without food, and people gathering in excited groups in the streets, grave fears are expressed that Berlin is on the eve of an armed communist uprising.

Six of the twelve members of the Berlin city council called on Chancellor Cuno and urged federal action to prevent such an occurrence. It was said to be the first time Berlin officials had appealed to the federal government for assistance in policing the city.

The councilmen foresaw general looting and pillage if the smouldering feeling of the populace becomes inflamed. The result of the conference at the chancellor's office was eagerly awaited. Leaders of both extremes, the communists and the Fascisti, or nationalists, are openly defying the government to enforce its ban upon meetings and demonstrations. Even if an uprising can be averted for another twenty-four hours, it is extremely doubtful that it can be avoided Sunday, when both the nationalists and reds have scheduled demonstrations.

The collapse of the food supply has caused most concern. Farmers are not bringing their products into the city and the markets were empty.

The shops that did stay open marked up prices 100 per cent in anticipation of a drop in the mark to that extent before nightfall. Threatened crowds besieged the markets. The nervous tension of the city was apparent. People ran into the streets, pausing for a moment, perhaps, to join one of the groups on the corners, and then starting off again at a quick trot, apparently without plan or purpose. Many of those sought food, both for immediate needs and to cache for the impending crisis that every one believes imminent.

Pockets and purses were stuffed with marks, but they were of no value. Hourly hundreds of additional food shops closed and prices ascended to dizzy heights.

British Knight Plans to Ease Arid Foreign Throats

London, July 28.—Lieut. Col. Sir Broderick Hartwell, former British army officer, has issued a circular inviting subscriptions of $12.50 or over for a whisky selling expedition on the high seas, according to the London Daily Express. The baronet states he has already arranged for 5,000 cases, and guarantees to return money invested plus 20 per cent interest within sixty days.

Giant Dogs Kill Boy; Fight Off Men With Clubs

New York, July 28.—With half a dozen men pounding them with rocks and sticks, two Great Danes attacked a nine-year-old boy so savagely at Floral Park, North Bergen, N. J., that his jugular vein was severed and he bled to death. The boy, Joseph Genatt, Jr., had slipped through the amusement park fence gate to get something to eat from a picnic table. With him were his brother, Albert, ten, and John Siniconi, ten. Suddenly two Great Danes, stationed as guards, leaped at him.

Baby Quits Crib, Crawls to Railway, and Is Run Over

Buffalo, N. Y., July 28.—Patrick Salisbury, two years old, crawled out of his crib at his home near the New York Central railroad tracks here, climbed up an embankment, and sat on a rail. A backing freight train passed over him. He was taken to a hospital with both legs cut off.

TO END 12-HOUR DAY

Gary Calls Presidents of All Subsidiaries to Parley.

Steel Magnate Says It Is Their Desire to Proceed as Vigorously as Possible With the Change.

New York, July 26.—Presidents of all subsidiaries of the United States Steel corporation have been summoned by Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the board, to meet in New York to discuss the elimination of the twelve-hour day.

The meeting has been called, Mr. Gary said, "to consider how and on what basis and when to begin to eliminate the twelve-hour day, it being our desire and intention to proceed as vigorously as possible."

The intention of the steel industry to rid itself of the twelve-hour day became known recently when President Harding, while in Tacoma, made public correspondence between him and directors of the American Iron and Steel institute, in which the steel masters pledged themselves to the revision of shifts as quickly as possible.

Labor leaders then questioned when a start would be made, and Mr. Gary, in recent interviews in this city, said the United States Steel corporation expected to make a beginning as soon as increasing labor supplies from Mexico, the Negro south, the Philippines and elsewhere made it possible. More recently he estimated that a start would be made within six weeks.

The meeting follows the announcement made by Mr. Gary on July 14 that the United States Steel corporation would begin within six weeks arrangements for the elimination of the twelve-hour day in its steel plants.

Other issues will follow until $60,000,000 has been raised to be added to the capital appropriated by congress.

Parachute Fails to Open and Jumper Is Killed

Cheyenne, Wyo., July 28.—Kenneth Keil, twenty-four, of Denver, known as "Diavolo," parachute jumper and "stunt" man with a flying circus of Denver, was killed here while performing at the Frontier Days show. Keil made a parachute jump and the parachute failed to open. He left the plane head first, and it is thought this caused the ropes of the parachute to tangle.

PRESIDENT ON CANADIAN SOIL

Tells an Audience at Vancouver U. S. Has No Annexation Ideas.

FRONTIER IS PEACE LESSON

Ancient Bugaboo Died Years and Years Ago, He Declares—Free Interchange of Residents Evidence of Interdependence.

Vancouver, B. C., July 27.—Warren G. Harding, the first American President who ever set foot on Canadian soil, told an audience here that the United States had no thought of annexing Canada, and smilingly added the advice that Canada should not think of annexing the United States.

"It is public will, not public force, that makes for enduring peace," he told an audience of Canadians in Stanley park. "Is it not a gratifying circumstance that it has fallen to the lot of us North Americans, living amicably for more than a century under different flags, to present the most striking example yet produced of that basic fact?

"If only European countries would heed the lesson conveyed by Canada and the United States, they would strike at the root of disagreements, and in their own prosperity forget to inveigh constantly at ours."

At another point he said that he found himself "quite unconsciously speaking of our two countries almost in the singular, when perhaps I should be more painstaking to keep them where they belong, in the plural."

"But I feel no need to apologize," he added. "You understand as well as I that I speak in no political sense.

"The ancient bugaboo of the United States scheming to annex Canada disappeared from all our minds years and years ago. Heaven knows we have all we can manage now and room to spare for another hundred million, before approaching the intensive stage of existence of many European states.

"And if I might be so boid as to offer a word of advice to you, it would be this: 'Do not encourage any enterprise looking to Canada's annexation of the United States. You are one of the most capable governing people in the world, but I entreat you, for your own sakes, to think twice before undertaking management of the territory which lies between the Great Lakes and the Rio Grande. No, let us go our own gaits along parallel roads, you helping us and we helping you."

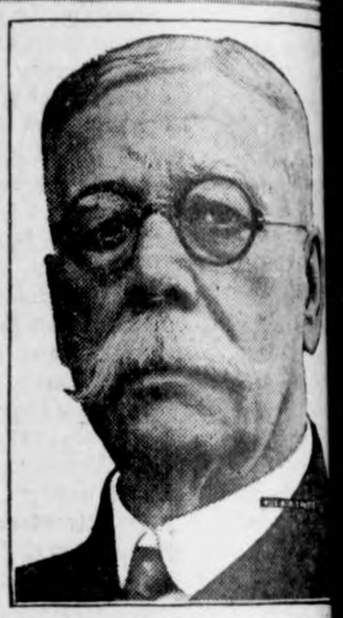
Good News for National Park Visito



Senator Francis E. Warren of Wyoming, who has been in the senate since 1890, is chairman of the senate committee on appropriations, who holds the Congressional Medal of Honor and is father-in-law of General Pershing, is possibly the most distinguished member of a congressional committee which has delighted the thousands interested in Rocky Mountain National park by promising the improvement of the Fall River road through that most popular of all the public playgrounds. This automobile highway climbs up from Estes park (7,500 feet elevation), crosses the Colorado Continental Divide at 12,000 feet, and descends to the Colorado River valley (8,000). Globe trotters say there is nothing like it in all the world. It is now a one-way road with turnouts.

Mystery of the Eel Solved at La

Every now and then this summer some angler will hook a big eel and his capture will set all the brotherhood to gossiping about the "eel mystery." For the life history of the eel has been a mystery always until recent discoveries by Dr. Johannes Schmidt, a Danish zoologist, after years of investigation.

He has now found out that the larvae of both the American and the European eel are born in the spring at the bottom of the Atlantic, at a depth of about 1,000 feet, on a limited tract about 500 miles northeast of the Leeward islands. During the first summer of their lives the larvae move up toward the surface, and in their second summer they start to migrate respectively toward the American and European coasts. By some marvelous instinct each species unerringly goes in the right direction.

In both cases, after their arrival in inland fresh water, they remain there until they become mature, at ab... the age of six years, when they return seaward in winter, traveling about te... miles nightly, until they reach their old breeding grounds, where, in their t... they propagate new larvae, and where they remain for the rest of their live...

THE ONLY "SURE THING" IN THE INVESTMENT FIELD

The Advice of Honest Men Who Know, and Willingness to Be Content With Reasonable Return, Declared Only Safe Road to Assured Income.

"Success in life depends upon the investments made of talents and time," says an article on investing prepared by the Committee on Public Education of the American Bankers Association. "Future return will be gain or loss, according to these investments. That is a law of life which controls investment of money, just as it controls investment of talents." The article, which is particularly timely in these days when so many are being robbed by fake investments, continues:

In the business sense, the word investment relates to the use of money in acquiring ownership of property. Ownership may represent entire possession of property as of a home; partial ownership as holding stock in a corporation; or conditional ownership as in the case of buying a mortgage or a bond. When a person makes an investment in bonds, he is really loaning his money to the government or corporation issuing them. He will receive the interest which they earn as long as he owns them, or until they are paid off.

Ownership of great corporations is vested in individuals who have invested money in their stock or bonds. Many people regard the ownership of the United States Steel Corporation, for example, as differing from the ownership of, say, a small workshop. Yet investors in shares of Steel Corporation stock are entitled to the same rights, under the law, as the owner of the workshop. In the corporation, the owners hold certificates of stock as evidence of their investment, whereas the owner of the little workshop holds a deed as title to his land.

Capitalistic Laws Protect Investors

Because the laws stand for the equal protection of all investors, it is possible and profitable to make good investments. It gives an incentive to work hard and to invest. The person who wishes to invest must first work and accumulate funds with which to do so.

Bonds are always secured by mortgages on the lands, buildings or other property of the corporation for which the money has been used. When a bond matures the money must be repaid to the owner of the bond.

All investors are a part of a great financial system which gathers up and puts to work the wealth of the country for the mutual benefit, prosperity, and well-being of all. In America, it is possible for any one who is willing to pay the price of self-denial and hard work, to be an investor. Good investments made in early life by saving such small sums as may be possible, lay the foundation for providing the comforts of later years, when it is harder to earn a livelihood and when poverty often becomes the condition of those who have not practiced thrift in youth.

It is not wise for those without experience to undertake to make investments of their money without guidance by those who know. Many companies are constantly being organized to promote unsound schemes, referred to as "wild-cat." There are always solicitors ready to relieve people of their savings by the promise of big returns. The lure of great wealth is always a temptation by which thousands of thrifty people are deprived of hard-earned savings every year. Widows and orphans who have inherited money are frequently sought and made the targets of these fake-stock salesmen. Misery and suffering are the usual results.

Greed Defeats Safety

Many people with small means also lose money because they insist on a high rate of interest on their investments. Safety of principal should be considered above large returns in interest or dividends. Small investors should never buy high-rate, speculative investments, in which there is a great risk, but should stick to those which pay a fair rate and which are known to be safe.

To know whether an investment is worth buying the investor should go to a banker, or a successful business man in whom he has confidence, get his opinion and act in accordance with it. In all probability this will mean the difference between successful investment and total loss of his money.

The banker deals with investments every day and desires to give all the help and information he can, and the business man has learned by experience the need of caution and careful judgment. They believe one should have a clear understanding of an investment before it is purchased. They know the need for avoiding stock promotion schemes and get-rich-quick propositions which in many cases have brought poverty and suffering. While many states have passed laws aimed to protect the public against promoters of fake investments, thousands of people annually fall victims to their wiles, because they fail to seek advice of those experienced in making investments.

Good advice and temperate expectations mark the only road to safe investment and an assured income. There is no other certain way.

HOW A RIP-ROARING RADICAL WAS TAMED

By JOHN OAKWOOD

The best story of the taming of a radical I have ever read is told by A. B. Farquhar in his book "The First Million the Hardest." It throws more light on the meaning of capitalism and the futility of socialism than a library full of books on sociology, economics and politics. Here it is as Farquhar tells it:

"The best antidote for acute economic insanity is ownership of property. My favorite example is Otto Steininger. He was one of my first employees and was a rip-roaring anarchist. He insisted that all wealth came from the workers and therefore should go back to the workers. He was particularly bitter against his landlord and hardly a week went by that he did not announce that he had definitely decided that he would like to shoot the landlord the next time he came around for the rent. Finally I asked him smilingly after one of these outbursts:

Buy, Don't Shoot

"'Why don't you buy your own house instead of shooting your landlord? Then you would not have to pay any rent. If you do shoot him you may get into trouble.'

"He did not think much of the idea apparently but in a day or two he asked me how he could buy the house. I answered: 'That house can be bought for $800. You are getting good wages. I will buy that house for you, take $4 a week out of your wages, and in less than four years you will have it paid for.'

"He went off again. The next time he came back it was with his wife. He said: 'We are going to buy that house but since we have no children you can take $10 instead of $4 a week out of my pay envelope.'

"I bought the house and then Otto's chief concern was to get it paid for, which he did in a little more than a year. There was another house next door to him. In a short while after he had paid for his first house, he sidled up to me and said:

"'I can buy that house next door for a thousand dollars. Now that we have no rent to pay we are going along good. What would you think about me buying that?'

"He bought that house and joined the hated landlord class. Some years later when it was reported that a band of strikers were advancing to shut all the factories, Otto rushed into my office at the head of an excited group of men from the shop yelling:

"'Get us a lot of shotguns and we'll keep those fellows out of here! Those fools expect a man to work and save and then walk in here and take what he has got without paying for it!'

"And that," Farquhar concludes, "I think, is always the way to develop a conservative."

GROWING RECOGNITION OF ADVERTISING'S USE

Advertising first established its place as an economic factor as a sales aid, but as understanding and use of it have increased, its possibilities in other fields have developed until today we find it employed in many forms of service hitherto unthought of. Advertising has long been hampered in its use by precedent, tradition, conventions, and prejudices, which, under analysis and experience, find little to warrant their existence. Gradually the falsity of their claims is being proved.

We were told for many years that it was undignified for a bank or fiduciary institution to advertise, and this edict, born of some superstition of the past, was accepted without question until finally it was intelligently challenged and it was discovered under analysis that there was no sufficient reason for its support. The inevitable conclusion of logic is that, whatever is of genuine use to human beings, whether it be goods or services, can, with truth and dignity, be advertised and sold, and that it is just as proper to merchandise forms of service as various kinds of commodities.

In the logical development of this new understanding of the power of advertising during the last decade, we have seen many of our banking fiduciary and investment institutions actively employing the sales value of advertising in the marketing of their services. In this intelligent use of publicity they are not only increasing their own immediate business return, but they are also helping to spread a better understanding of financial service and economic fact and theory upon which solid business relations can be built.—Francis H. Sisson, Journal of the American Bankers Association.

READY TO COMMENCE WAREHOUSING PLAN

DES MOINES, The Iowa department of agriculture announced today that it was ready to help farmers throuout the state in organizing local boards to put into effect the warehousing plan for grain storage adopted during the last legislature.

Secretary R. W. Cassidy said today that this was a particulary advantageous time to take such steps, with Iowa wheat prices making it advisable to hold until an increase in the market.

RAISED FLOCK OF PHEASANTS

While working in the field last spring Geo. Sheffield found a pheasant's nest and rather than destroy the eggs brought them to the house and placed hem under a setting hen. As a result thirteen little peppy fellows were duly hatched. They were placed in a separate coop for a time so they could not get corn and other dry feed thrown out for the chickens, as this sort of feed is said to kil them. Later they were let out in the yard and for several months remained about the place. They are still seen occasionally. When they wandered onto the highway two of them were killed by passing automobiles.— Clarion Monitor.

particularly good. The 1913 mortgage is now due,—20,000 marks are to be paid. Marks are quoted 120,000 to the dollar. Twenty-thousand marks, one-sixth of that, therefore equal one-sixth of a dollar,—16 2-3 cents. On the theory that "a mark is a mark," the debtor could wipe off his $5,000 mortgage for 16 2-3 cents,—less than the value of a dozen eggs.

That is, he can unless the pipe dream comes to a sudden end. For one thing the German courts are ruling that the theory "a mark is a mark" doesn't go,—that a debtor has to give back a fair equivalent for what he received and that present paper marks worth 120,000 to the dollar are not the fair equivalent of former gold marks at four to the dollar.

Furthermore all pipe dreams are too good to be true. They are not what they seem. The smoke is wearing off in Germany and they are coming down to earth with a dull thud. It is beginning to be realized that the net result of a paper money nightmare is that producers are robbed and speculators enriched. Farmers are unable to raise prices for their products fast enough to keep up with the failing purchasing power of unsound money. The value of such money slips away from them like a handful of dry sand. It brings back to them less in purchases than they gave of their products to get it.

The farmer as a result can't make ends meet and when he gets into difficulties the unsound money speculator steps in and buys up mortgaged farm lands cheap—and thus it is mostly the speculator who profits by paying off the mortgages with currency worth less than a dozen eggs,—unless the courts stop him.

To see him thus, to ...ve the strange affinity between the ... of this ... become primitive, and the savage environment that had developed him, were powerful helps to Madeline Hammond in her strange desire to understand his nature.

A cracking of iron-shod hoofs behind her broke the spell. Monty had reached the summit.

"Gene, what it won't all be doin' in a minnut Moses hisself couldn't tell," observed Monty.

Then Dorothy climbed to his side and looked.

"Oh, isn't it just perfectly lovely!" she exclaimed. "But I wish it wouldn't storm. We'll all get wet."

Once more Stewart faced the ascent, keeping to the slow heave of the ridge as it rose southward toward the looming spires of rock. Soon he was off smooth ground, and Madeline, some rods behind him, looked back with concern at her friends. Here the real toil, the real climb began, and a mountain storm was about to burst in all its fury.

The sky grew blacker; the slow-gathering clouds appeared to be suddenly agitated; they piled and rolled and mushroomed and obscured the crags. The air moved heavily and seemed to be laden with sulphurous smoke, and sharp lightning flashes began to play. A distant roar of wind could be heard between the peals of thunder.

Stewart waited for Madeline under the lee of a shelving cliff, where the cowboys had halted the pack-train. Majesty was sensitive to the flashes of lightning. Madeline patted his neck and softly called to him. The weary burros nodded; the Mexican women covered their heads with their mantles. Stewart untied the slicker at the back of Madeline's saddle and helped her on with it. Then he put on his own. The other cowboys followed suit. Presently Madeline saw Monty and Dorothy rounding the cliff, and hoped the others would come soon.

A blue-white, knotted rope of lightning burned down out of the clouds, and instantly a thunder-clap crashed, seeming to shake the foundations of the earth. This moment of the breaking of the storm, with the strange growing roar of wind, like a moaning monster, was pregnant with a heart-disturbing emotion for Madeline Hammond. Glorious it was to be free, healthy, out in the open, under the shadow of the mountain and cloud, in the teeth of the wind and rain and storm.

Suddenly, as the ground quaked under her horse's feet, and all the sky grew black and crisscrossed by flaming streaks, and between thunderous reports there was a strange hollow roar sweeping down upon her, she realized how small was her knowledge and experience of the mighty forces of nature.

With blacker gloom and deafening roar came the torrent of rain. It was a cloud-burst. It was like solid water tumbling down. For long Madeline sat her horse, head bent to the pelting rain. When its force lessened and she heard Stewart call for all to follow, she looked up to see that he was starting once more. She turned her horse into his trail.

Rain fell steadily. The fury of the storm, however, had passed, and the roll of thunder diminished in volume. The air had wonderfully cleared and was growing cool. Madeline began to feel uncomfortably cold and wet. Stewart was climbing faster than formerly, and she noted that Monty kept at her heels, pressing her on. Time had been lost, and the camp-site was a long way off. The stag-hounds began to lag and get footsore. The sharp rocks of the trail were cruel to their feet. Then, as Madeline began to tire, she noticed less and less around her. Her horse climbed and climbed, and brush and sharp corners of stone everlastingly pulled and tore at her wet garments. A gray gloom settled down around her. Night was approaching.

Stewart's horse was on a jog-trot now, and Madeline left the trail more to Majesty than to her own choosing.

As black night began to envelop her surroundings, she marked that the fir trees had given place to pine forest. Suddenly a pin-point of light pierced the ebony blackness. It grew larger. Black tree-trunks crossed her line of vision. The light was a fire. She heard a cowboy song and the wild chorus of a pack of coyotes. Stewart's tall figure, with sombrero slouched down, was now and then outlined against a growing circle of light. And by the aid of that light she saw him turn every moment or so to look back, probably to assure himself that she was close behind.

With a prospect of fire and warmth, and food and rest, Madeline's enthusiasm revived. What a climb! There was promise in this wild ride and lonely trail and hidden craggy height, not only in the adventure her friends yearned for, but in some nameless joy and spirit for herself.

CHAPTER XV

The Crags.

Glad indeed was Madeline to be lifted off her horse beside a roaring fire—to see steaming pots upon red-hot coals. Except about her shoulders, which had been protected by the slicker, she was wringing wet. The Mexican women came quickly to help her change in a tent nearby; but Madeline preferred for the moment to warm her numb feet and hands and to watch the spectacle of her arriving friends.

"Warm clothes—hot drinks and grub—warm blankets," rang out Stewart's sharp order.

Then, with Florence helping the Mexican women, it was not long until Madeline and the feminine side of the party were comfortable, except for the weariness and aches that only rest and sleep could alleviate.

Neither fatigue nor pains, however, nor the strangeness of being packed sardinelike under canvas, nor the howls of coyotes, kept Madeline's guests from stretching out with long, grateful sighs, and one by one dropping into deep slumber. Madeline whispered a little to Florence, and laughed with her once or twice, and then the light flickering on the canvas faded and her eyelids closed. Darkness and roar of camp life, low voices of men, thump of horses' hoofs, coyote serenade, the sense of warmth and sweet rest—all drifted away.

When she awakened shadows of swaying branches moved on the sunlit canvas above her. Slow, regular breathing attested to the deep slumbers of her tent comrades. She observed presently that Florence was missing from the number. Madeline rose and peeped out between the flaps.

An exquisitely beautiful scene surprised and enthralled her gaze. Eager to get out where she could enjoy an unrestricted view, she searched for her pack, found it in a corner, and then hurriedly and quietly dressed.

Her favorite stag-hounds, Russ and Tartar, were asleep before the door, where they had been chained. She awakened them and loosened them, thinking the while that it must have been Stewart who had chained them near her. Close at hand also was a cowboy's bed rolled up in a tarpaulin.

The cool air, fragrant with pine and spruce and some subtle nameless tang, sweet and tonic, made Madeline stand erect and breathe slowly and deeply. It was like drinking of a magic draught. She felt it in her blood, that it quickened its flow. Turning to look in the other direction, beyond the tent, she saw the remnants of last night's temporary camp, and farther on a grove of beautiful pines from which came the sharp ring of the ax. Wider gaze took in a wonderful park, not only surrounded by lofty crags, but full of crags of lesser height, many lifting their heads from dark green groves of trees. The morning sun, not yet above the eastern elevations, sent its rosy and golden shafts in between the towering rocks to tip the pines.

Madeline, with the hounds beside her, walked through the nearest grove. The ground was soft and springy and brown with pine-needles.

Florence espied her under the trees and came running. She was like a young girl, with life and color and joy. She wore a flannel blouse, corduroy skirt, and moccasins. And her hair was fastened under a band like an Indian's.

"Castleton's gone with a gun, for hours, it seems," said Florence. "Gene just went to hunt him up. The other gentlemen are still asleep. I imagine they sure will sleep up heah in this air."

Then, business-like, Florence fell to questioning Madeline about details of camp arrangement which Stewart, and Florence herself, could hardly see to without suggestion.

As the day advanced the charm of the place grew upon Madeline. Even at noon, with the sun beating down, there was comfortable warmth rather than heat. It was the kind of warmth that Madeline liked to feel in the spring.

Presently a chorus of merry calls attracted her attention, and she turned to see Helen limping along with Dorothy, and Mrs. Beck and Edith supporting each other. They were all rested, but lame, and delighted with the place, and as hungry as bears awakened from a winter's sleep.

Then they had dinner, sitting on the ground after the manner of Indians; and it was a dinner that lacked merriment only because everybody was too busily appeasing appetite.

For a few days the prevailing features of camp life for Madeline's guests were sleep and rest. The men were more visibly affected by the mountain air than the women.

This languorous spell disappeared presently, and then the days were full of life and action. Necessarily, of course, Madeline and her guests were now thrown much in company with the cowboys. And the party grew to be like one big family.

Madeline found the situation one of keen and double interest for her. If before she had cared to study her cowboys, particularly Stewart, now, with the contrasts afforded by her guests, she felt by turns she was amused and mystified and perplexed and saddened, and then again subtly pleased.

From the thought of Stewart, and the watchfulness growing out of it, she discovered more about him. He was not happy; he often paced up and down the grove at night; he absented himself from camp sometimes during the afternoon when Nels and Nick and Monty were there; he was always watching the trails, as if he expected to see some one come riding up. He alone of the cowboys did not indulge in the fun and talk around the campfire. He remained preoccupied and sad, and was always looking away into distance. Madeline had a strange sense of his guardianship over her; and, remembering Don Carlos, she imagined he worried a good deal over his charge, and, indeed, over the safety of all the party.

A favorite lounging spot of Madeline's was a shaded niche under the lee of crags facing the east. Here in the shade of afternoon, she and Edith would often lounge under a low-branched tree. Seldom they talked much, for it was afternoon and dreamy with the strange spell of this mountain fastness. There was smoky haze in the valleys, a fleecy cloud resting over the peaks, a sailing eagle in the blue sky, silence that was the unbroken silence of the wild heights, and a soft wind laden with incense of pine.

One afternoon, however, Edith appeared prone to talk seriously.

"See here, Majesty Hammond, do you intend to spend the rest of your life in this wilderness?" she asked, bluntly.

Madeline was silent.

"Oh, it is glorious! Don't misunderstand me, dear," went on Edith, earnestly, as she laid her hand on Madeline's. "This trip has been a revelation to me. I did not tell you, Majesty, that I was ill when I arrived. Now I'm well. So well! Look at Helen, too. Why, she was a ghost when we got here. Now she is brown and strong and beautiful. If it were for nothing else than this wonderful gift of health I would love the West. But I have come to love it for other things—even spiritual things. Majesty, I have been studying you. I see and feel what this life has made of you. When I came I wondered at your strength, your virility, your serenity, your happiness. And I was stunned. I wondered at the causes of your change. Now I know. You were sick of idleness, sick of uselessness, if not of society—sick of the horrible noises and smells and contacts one can no longer escape in the cities. I am sick of all that, too, and I could tell you many women of our kind who suffer in a like manner. You have done what many of us want to do, but have not the courage. You have left it. I am not blind to the splendid difference you have made in your life. I think I would have discovered, even if your brother had not told me, what good you have done to the Mexicans and cattlemen of your range. Then you have work to do. That is much the secret of your happiness, is it not? Tell me. Tell me something of what it means to you?"

"Work, of course, has much to do with any one's happiness," replied Madeline. "No one can be happy who has no work. As regards myself—for the rest I can hardly tell you. I have never tried to put it in words. Frankly, I believe, if I had not had money that I could not have found such contentment here. That is not in any sense a judgment against the West. But if I had been poor I could not have bought and maintained my ranch. Stillwell tells me there are many larger ranches than mine, but none just like it. Then I am almost paying my expenses out of my business. Think of that! My income, instead of being wasted, is mostly saved. I think—I hope I am useful. Of course my ranch and range are real, my cowboys are typical. If I were to tell you how I feel about them it would simply be a story of how Madeline Hammond sees the West. They are true to the West. It is I who am strange, and what I feel for them may be strange, too. Edith, hold to your own impressions."

"But, Majesty, my impressions have changed. At first I did not like the wind, the dust, the sun, the endless open stretches. But now I do like them. Where once I saw only terrible wastes of barren ground now I see beauty and something noble. Then, at first, your cowboys struck me as dirty, rough, loud, crude, savage—all that was primitive. But I was wrong. I have changed. The dirt was only dust, and this desert dust is clean. They are still rough, loud, crude, and savage in my eyes, but with a difference. They are natural men. They are little children. Monty Price is one of nature's noblemen. The hard thing is to discover it. All his hideous person, all his actions and speech, are masks of his real nature. Nels is a joy, a simple, sweet, kindly, quiet man whom some woman should have loved. What would love have meant to him! He told me that no woman ever loved him except his mother, and he lost her when he was ten. Every man ought to be loved—especially such a man as Nels. Somehow his gun record does not impress me. I never could believe he killed a man. Then take your foreman, Stewart. He is a cowboy, his work and life the same as the others. But he has education and most of the graces we are in the habit of saying make a gentleman. Stewart is a strange fellow, just like this strange country. He's a man, Majesty, and I admire him. So, you see, my impressions are developing with my stay out here. I like the country, I like the men. One reason I want to go home soon is because I am discontented enough at home now, without falling in love with the West, for, of course, Majesty, I would. I could not live out here. And that brings me to my point. Admitting all the beauty and charm and wholesomeness and good of this wonderful country, still it is no place for you, Madeline Hammond. You have your position, your wealth, your name, your family. You must marry. You must have children. You must not give up all that for a quixotic life in a wilderness."

"I am convinced, Edith, that I shall live here all the rest of my life."

"Oh, Majesty! I hate to preach this way. But I promised your mother I would talk to you. And the truth is I hate—I hate what I'm saying. I envy you your courage and wisdom. I know you have refused to marry Boyd Harvey. I could see that in his face. I believe you will refuse Castleton. Whom will you marry? What chance is there for a woman of your position to mary out here? What in the world will become of you?"

"Quien sabe?" replied Madeline with a smile that was almost sad.

Not so many hours after this conversation with Edith Madeline sat with Boyd Harvey upon the grassy promontory overlooking the west, and she listened once again to his suave courtship.

Suddenly she turned to him and said, "Boyd, if I married you would you be willing—glad to spend the rest of your life here in the West?"

"Majesty!" he exclaimed. There was amaze in the voice usually so even and well modulated—amaze in the handsome face usually so indifferent. Her question had startled him. She saw him look down the iron-gray cliffs, over the barren slopes and cedared ridges, beyond the cactus-covered foothills to the grim and ghastly desert. Just then, with its red veils of sunlit dust-clouds, its illimitable waste of ruined and upheaved earth, it was a sinister spectacle.

"No," he replied, with a tingle of shame in his cheek.

Madeline said no more, nor did he speak. She was spared the pain of refusing him, and she imagined he would never ask her again. There was both relief and regret in the conviction.

It was impossible not to like Boyd Harvey. He was handsome, young, rich, well born, pleasant, cultivated—he was all that made a gentleman of his class. He was considered a very desirable and eligible young man. Madeline admitted all this.

Then she thought of things that were perhaps exclusively her own strange ideas. Boyd Harvey's white skin did not tan even in this southwestern sun and wind. His hands were whiter than her own, and as soft. They were a proof that he never worked. His frame was tall, graceful, elegant. It did not bear evidence of ruggedness. He had never indulged in a sport more strenuous than yachting. He hated effort and activity. He rode horseback very little, disliked any but moderate motoring, spent much time in Newport and Europe, never walked when he could help it, and had no ambition unless it were to pass the days pleasantly. If he ever had any sons they would be like him, only a generation more toward the inevitable extinction of his race.

Madeline returned to camp in just the mood to make a sharp, deciding contrast. It happened—fatefully, perhaps—that the first man she saw was Stewart. Stewart was a combination of fire, strength, and action. These attributes seemed to cling about him. There was something vital and compelling in his presence. In him Madeline saw the strength of his forefathers unimpaired. The life in him was marvelously significant.

Madeline Hammond compared the man of the East with the man of the West; and that comparison was the last parting regret for her old standards.

Origin of Old Saying.

The saying, "Good Wine Needs No Bush," owes its origin to the ancient custom of hanging out an ivy bush at the doors of taverns—probably in honor of Bacchus, to whom the ivy was sacred—to inform travelers that "good cheer" might be found within. Many references to this custom are found in the old poets and dramatists. In Lily's "Euphues" are these lines: "Things of greatest profit are set forth with least price. Where wine is neat, there needeth no ivie-bush."

"SIOUX CITY IN WORLD WAR"

Historian of Monahan Post Is Praised as Author of History of the Organization.

Fred W. Pierce, historian of the Edward H. Monahan post of the American Legion in Sioux City, Ia., received the praise of the Legion's national executive committee for his work as director of the Gold Star ceremonial, a patriotic community tribute to the World war dead, and as author of a history of the Monahan post.

The production was held three days, during which it was witnessed by almost every resident of the city. It symbolized the participation of Sioux City in the World war, paying tribute to the memory of 114 men killed in the war.

Scenes from the war, pageantry, music and addresses of orators carried out an allegory, culminating in a tableaux designed to portray the efforts of the American Legion in honoring the dead.

FRED W. PIERCE

A most impressive feature of the presentation was the escort to the auditorium of a large number of "gold star" mothers and wives of deceased soldiers.

Pierce was the moving spirit in conducting the ceremonial, and in compiling the history, "Sioux City in the World War." A portion of the admission fees to the ceremonial and of profits from sale of the history were devoted to the Legion's fund to provide for the permanent annual decoration of overseas graves.

WON MANY 'VARSITY HONORS

Harry Bolles, Yakima, Wash., Brother of National Adjutant, Now Naval Officer.

Captain and stroke of the 'varsity crew at the United States Naval academy, would be more than enough glory for the average "middy" at Annapolis to aspire to. Add to this three years on the 'varsity crew, three years on the 'varsity football team, and membership on the boxing and wrestling squads, and you have quite a record. Add still the Naval academy cup, awarded to the graduate contributing most to the advancement of athletics in the academy during the year, and you have a part of the accomplishments of Harry Bolles, of Yakima, Wash., a brother of Lemuel Bolles, national adjutant of the American Legion, who has just received his commission as a naval officer from Uncle Sam.

Ensign Bolles is a World war veteran, and a member of the American Legion, having enlisted when seventeen years old at the outbreak of the war. He served for two years as a member of a gun crew on the transport "Great Northern." After the war he obtained his entrance to the Naval academy by passing the hardest sort of competitive examination, where he made good from the start.

FINE KANSAS CITY MEMORIAL

Erection of Splendid Structure to Perpetuate Memory of World War Heroes Now in Progress.

Work of erecting the huge Liberty memorial in Kansas City, Mo., has begun and at least 18 months will be required for completion of construction, according to contractors in charge of the work. The memorial is to take the form of a monumental building and tower to perpetuate the memory of heroes of the World war.

The principal feature of the shrine is the 216-foot stone shaft above the building proper. This towers 350 feet above the Union station plaza and may be seen for miles. At the base of this shaft four sculptured figures representing Courage, Honor, Patriotism and Sacrifice—of heroic proportions, stand as guardians to the "Flame of Inspiration," to burn on the altar atop the towering shaft. These figures are to be designed by Robert I. Aitken, a sculptor of considerable repute, who saw service in the World war.

The edifice itself, to be known as the Memorial and American Legion building, is to be a massive structure of stone and steel, surmounted by the great shaft. The total construction cost is over $1,000,000, which does not include mural paintings, sculpture, lighting, landscaping and other work necessary for completion, all of which are estimated to require at least three-quarters of a million dollars.

Will Help Lay Your Plans

No "ifs or ands" about it— Prosperity, or her advance agent, is headed for the Heart of America. Progressive farmers are turning from their "problems" to their "plans."

Yes, hogs are low. And freight rates are too high. Several other things are out of kilter. Nevertheless, agricultural leadership is once more on the job.

Enterprising farmers are buying modern equipment. CONDITIONS? They are going to meet the conditions with reduced cost of production. That, in many sections means power farming — Tractors.

CLIMATIC CONDITIONS? The progressive farmer doesn't spend his time "hollering" about the drought or the washout, but he spends it planning, —planning how to make the most under the conditions.

It is dry for corn, but there are enough stalks in the fields now, if properly prepared, to feed as much stock as the ears alone would feed from a bumper crop.

By cutting the corn and running it thru a grinder that grinds stalks and all as fine as gound oats you can increase the feed per acre 50%.

A good tractor and grinder of this type can be paid for in a year or two if put to work. When are you going to turn from your "problems" to your plans"?

RESIDENT HARDING'S FUNERAL TO BE HELD FRIDAY

ATION ASKED TO MOURN HARDING FRIDAY, AUG. 10

amaion Is First Official Act of New Chief Executive of U. S.

WASHINGTON:— The first of- al act of President Coolidge as new executive of the nation was signature Saturday of a procla- ion announcing President's Hard 's death and calling upon the ntry to observe Friday, Aug. 10 a day of mourning and prayer. that day Mr. Harding's body is be buried at Marion, Ohio.

The proclamation was signed at 18 a. m. It was brought to the sident's hotel suite by J. Butler right, third assistant Secretary of te and then was returned to the te departmnet for he signaure of cretary Hughes.

OUR PRESIDENT IS DEAD

One of our saddest duties is ti ronicle the passing of our friends m time to time. In this particu- r insance it so happens that our loved president of these United ates has left us with terrible sud- nness.

President Harding can truly be assed in the above catagory as riend" to every man, woman and ild in this or any country. His endid life, and achievements are ronicled in an epitomized way in is week's edition of this paper. e are fortunate indeed in being a e to secure this service which mes to us from the dispatches of e day.

CONDENSED LIFE STORY OF WARREN G. HARDING

Warren Gamaliel Harding was rn near the village of Corsica O., ov. 2, 1865.

His father, Dr. G. T. Harding was country physican who added to is income by conducting a small rm. His mother was formerly Miss hebe Elizbeth Dickerson

Warren, the eldest of eight child- en attended the village school, and his fourteenth year attended the hio Central college in Iberia, O e graduated with a B. S. degree in 882. taught shool for a year, read w for another for another year and hen was given the ownership of the arion. O. Star, by his father.

Ran a Newspaper

Harding conducted the newspaper or some time against great finan- ial odds, but finally was forced to ell it. He toak a job as reporter on he Marion Mirror, but political dif- erences with the owner, resulted in is leaving shortly.

He again became owner of the tar and with the assistance of his ife formally Miss Florence Eliza- eth Kling. whom he married in 891, made it highly sucessful.

Harding first held public office in 900 when he became state senator. He held this office until 1904 when he took office as lieutenant gov- rnor of Ohio. In 1910 he ran for governor but was defeated.

Senator- President

In 1914 Harding was elected U. S. senator from Ohio and was tem- pory chairman of the Republican convention in 1916.

He remained in the Senate until He was nominated for president on the Republican ticket in 1920. He was elected the 29th president of the United States, Nov. 2 1920, on his 55th birthday, and took office March 4, 1921.

THOSE SUGAR PRICES

There is a maliciaus humor in there sugar prices. The present tar- iff increased the tariff only 16 cents per hundred pounds, but the sugar barons increased the price $3 per hundred pounds. In other words the goverment got 16 cents and the sugar barons $2.84 per hundred. Was the tariff to blame for this? When the price in 1920 was sky- rocketed the same as the present no one blamed the tariff. —Decorah (Ia.) Republican

NEWS NUBBINS

"The time has come," the Walrus said, "to talk of many things—of shoes and ships and sealing wax; of cabbages and kings."

..Figures obtained at the officee of Federal fuel administrator Wadleigh stand out like beacons of hope to coal consumers lost in the maze of prediction of serious shortages, high prices, impending strikes and other hardships. These figures indicate that on July 14, 54,800,000 tons of anthracite had been mined since the first of the year, a figure approximately 5,300,000 tons in excess of the record production up until this year. The average consumption of the country for the whole year is 90,000,000 tons.

Bradstreets last review of trade says: "Considering the season, trade and industry are still well above fair, and certainly better than at this date in any year since 1919. Caution and conservatism still rule, in fact, and, pending a clearer view of crop outturn, the future still lacks definite form. Against this, it is to be noted that distribution, as indicaed by all obtainable data, is still of relatively heavy volume. In building, current and pending operations are active, but new plantings contin ue to decrease, with natural effects on lumber buying and, in some markets, prices although producing centers the mills are still busy on banked-up orders."

Will Preserve Mark Twain's Old Home.

The regret felt at the recent destruction by fire of the home in which Mark Twain spent his last days should add interest to the movement being carried on by newspaper editors in northeast Missouri, to preserve the humorists' birthplace at the little home town of Floida. The owner of the house agrees to donoate it, with its quaint pioneer furnishings, and the editors, organized as the Mark Twain Memorial park association, are raising fund to puchase at least one hundred acres of land surrounding he house and develope it as a public park to be presented to the state or nation as a permanent memorial to the great author. Owners of the land agree to accept a price fixed by a committee of the assiciation, and the editors state that all "those who make contributions can rest assured that more than one hundred cents' worth of real value will be obtained for every dollar that is given."

The number of casualties of the world war who are drawing pensions is estimated at 10,000,000 in a report communicated by the international labor bureau to a conference of experts being held to study methods of placing all of these men at work. Details given by several countries make a total of 7,124,000 and the balance is accounted by those countries which did not submit figures. Germany has 1,537,000 pensioned men; Australia 76,000; Austria, 164,000; Belgium. 50,000; Canada 45,000; the United States, 157,000. Finland, 10,000; France 1,500,000; Great Britain 1,170,000; Italy. 800,000; Poland 32,000; Roumania, 100,000; Jugo-Slavia, 164,000; Russia, 775,000; Czecho-Slavakio; 236,000, and New Zealand, 20,000. Statistics are lacking for Turkey, Bulgaria, the Baltic states, Portugal, Hungary and Japan.

The Westen Union Telegraph Co. announces that it has signed a contract with the Italian Submarine Cables company to establish jointly a direct cable line between the U. S. and Italy by way of the Azores, Supplementing the Western Union's formal announcement. President Newcomb Carlton explained that the projected line would be the longest and highest capacity direct cable across the Atlantic. The proposed cable will be able to transmit 50,000,000 words a year or five times the volume that can be handled by any existing Western Union Cable.

The United States Torpedo boat destroyers, Hatfield, Goff, Fox and Barry, with the auxiliary Orion, have arrived at Gibraltar to take part in the unveiling on August 2 of a memorial tablet in commemoration of the men of all ratings of the American Navy who fell during the war. Other United States warships are expected soon and 3,500 American sailors will take part in the ceremony by dedicating the tablet, which is in the dockyard.

Actual Work on the Mofat tunnel, through the Continental divide west of Denver, Col., is expected to begin early this month. Bids for construction are being advertised and the bonds are being offered for sale. The tunnel will cut the rail distance between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans by several hundred miles. Its construction will be an engineering feat of much difficulty and a great national importance, for it will open up a large section of land in northwestern Colorado rich in natural resources.

STATE FAIR TO START SOON

Every Thing In Readiness For Big Opening

Everything is now in readiness for the opening of Iowa's big Prosperity Fair, the 69 annual Iowa State Fair, August 22-31.

..Entries in the live stock departments which closed last week have boosted the horse, cattle, swine and sheep lists to unprecedented porportions. Between 7,500 and 8,000 head of live stock are now entered for the Fair, giving Iowa a record as the biggest livestock and agricultural fair in the Union this year.

In one of the exhibits there will be 500 head of baby beeves raised by Iowa's boy and girl farmers. In addition to the above. over 3,000 birds are entered in the poultry and pigeon show.

Every available foot of space on the fairgrounds will be crowded with exhibits and amusements, fair officials said today.

Grain and produce displays will be particularly heavy. Many new features are also enrolled in the educational departments, including a special carload of displays by the United States Dept. of Agriculture, a section of Iowa State College, exhibits by the Pure Bred Sire and Cow Test Associations, the highway Commission, the State Board of Control and numerous others. Two hundred cars will be seen in the auto show and nearly 40 acres of farm machinery and equipment in this section.

There will be amusements galore; horse racing, auto racing, mule races, seven bands, twelve circus and hippodrome features, a big night fireworks spectacle. "India", a state horseshoe pitching tournament, a horse and mule team pulling contest an 80 acre free camp. New attendance records are forecast this year.

To Have Big Loud Speaker

A giant "loud speaker" which can be regulated to carry music and speeches more than a mile with perfect clearness, is being installed by the Northwestern Bell Teephone Company at the State Fair Grounds here this week as an innovation for grand stnd udiences t the coming Iowa State Fair, Aug. 22-31.

It wil be operated directly in front of the grandstand crowds to hear with perfect clearness every announcement, every note on the elaborate musical program which has been arranged, and public addresses which are contemplated for special days. This is the same device which carried President Harding's speech to tens of thousands at Arlington last spring and which was used by William Jennings Bryan at the recent Christian Endeavor convention in Des Moines.

Operated by electricity, vacuum tubes and giant wiiden horns, the apparatus is the invention of the Bell System experts and is said to be one of the most wonderful steps in speech transmission that has been made in recent years.

NEW CATSUP RECIPES AND CANNING HELPS

Four New Suggestions from the August Farm Journal

.."When canning apples," says the Household Editor in the August issue of the Farm Journal, "pare and quarter the fruit the night before, then cover with cold water and allow to stand overnight. This toughens the fiber in the apples so that they retain their shape. A slice of pineapple might be added to a quart jar of apples will improve their flavor.

Tomato Catsup, Made the Farm Journal way; Use one peck of tomatoes, cut in halves or quarters. Place these in a kettle and boil for a half hour and strain through a sieve. After removing skins and seeds, return pulp to the kettle and add one-half dessertspoonful of cayenne pepper, 1 dessertspoonful of black peper, allspice, cloves, mace and mustard (all ground) and three desertspoonfuls of salt. Boil slowly for four or five hours, add one pint of vinegar, bottle and eal.

..Cucumber Catsup, as given in a recipe in the Farm Jounral for August, requires one dozen large cucumbers, one quart of vinegar, one tablespoon of salt, one-quarter teaspoonful of cayenne pepper. Gather cucumbers before the sun strikes them and keep in a cool place until used. Peel the cucumbers and run them through a food chopper. Drain off the water. Heat the vinega r and pepper and salt to the boiling point; pour at once over cucumber pulp, bottle and seal. Cucumbers bottled in this way retain their fresh flavor and make particularily good sauce to serve with beefstek.

"Grape Catsup is new to many," says the Household editor of the Farm Journalin the August number. "It requires four pounds of grapes, two tablespoonfuls of cinnamon, one tablespoonful each of cloves and alspice, one quarter of a teaspoonful of cayenne pepper (if desired) one cupful of vinegar, one teaspoonful of salt and oneand one-half lbs. of sugar.

Wash and stem the grapes and steam them over water until soft. Put through a colander or seive, discarding the skins and seeds. To the portion which passes through the seive add spices, sugar, salt and vinegar and let simmer for fifteen minutes. Bottle and seal. Use whole spices tied in a cloth while cooking and remove before bottling. Grapes of the acid variety are prefered to very sweet ones."

All but two of the above members have been feeding grain all summer. One separator was found to be robbing its owner of $7.65 for the month. About $7.00 was spent for repairs and now the separator is doing excellent work. One pure bred bull was sold and replaced by a better animal.

Five members are having their cows tested for T. B. Only four head head were lost by the first two tests.

A good representation is expected at the Diary Cattle congress at Waterloo, Ia, Sept. 24,30.

ARREST FOUR FOR SHOOTING PHEASANTS

Four Chicago sportsmen were arrested on a highway near the vicinity of Iowa Falls, by Aug. Greimer, of Blairsburg, state fish and game warden, on a charge of shooting pheasants one day last week. Each of the men had four birds. Under the charges filed, the men could be fined as high as $509 apiece.

Several years ago Iowa was stocked with pheasants and they are protected by the state laws. The charges filed against the men include shooting pheasants against the law, hunting on the public highway and hunting without the legal non-residents license. The men were brought to Iowa Falls by the game warden where they gave bonds to appear at a later hearing.

According to the Iowa laws it is unlawful to take Hungarian partridges or Mongolian ringneck, Englishor Chinese pheasants prior to the first day of October, 1927. —Iowa Falls Sentinal.

AN ANTICIPATED INJURY

The sisterly quarrel between Katkerine and Margaret waxed hot and furious. Katherine hit Margaret with a stick and partental jurisdiction was called in. "Katherine" said Daddy, "did you hit Margaret with that stick?" Katherine defiantly confessed her guilt. "Why did you do it? "Because" Katherine retorted, righteous indignation flashing from her eyes, "afterwards she hit me!"

PRESIDENT HARDING DIES SUDDENLY

Stroke of Apoplexy Is Fatal When His Recovery Was Deemed Certain—Mrs. Harding With Him at the End—Whole World Is Shocked.

Washington.—Death claimed Warren G. Harding with shocking suddenness at 7:30 p. m. Thursday at San Francisco. In the midst of apparent recovery he was stricken with apoplexy while Mrs. Harding was reading to him. The end came quickly.

The special train left San Francisco at 7 p. m. Friday, routed directly to the capital by way of Reno, Ogden, Cheyenne, Omaha and Chicago.

The train made no stops en route except those necessary for its operation. The body of the President was borne in the rear car. The car was lighted at night, and at all times two soldiers and two sailors, a part of a naval and military guard of sixteen enlisted men, stood at attention guarding the casket.

The train carried the presidential party as composed during the trip across the country to Alaska, and also General Pershing, Attorney General Daugherty, and Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Remsberg and family, Mrs. Remsberg being a sister of the President.

Untold thousands of American citizens stood with uncovered heads, day and night, as the train passed.

Through Nevada in the hours of daylight and darkness there were mourners at the stations. Utah contributed its thousands the next day. Wyoming's citizens mourned en masse. And so on across the continent. At the cities, especially, large crowds assembled at the stations.

President Harding died of a stroke of apoplexy at 7:30 o'clock Thursday night (10:30 p. m., New York time). His exact age was fifty-seven years and nine months.

The end came suddenly while Mrs. Harding was reading to him from a magazine and after what had been called the best day he had had since the beginning of his illness exactly one week before.

Suddenly it was noticed that the President was shuddering and gasping. Mrs. Harding ran to him, but he was unable to respond to her inquiries. She then ran to the door of the sick room and called to the secret service man there to summon the President's physicians.

When General Sawyer reached the room the President was still alive, but he died almost at once.

Collapse Is Sudden.

In greater detail the facts of the death are related. With Mrs. Harding in the sickroom were two nurses. Due to the seeming improvement in the President's condition, members of his party, including the physicians who had remained in constant call, were confident they could leave the hotel for a few hours' relaxation. Many of them were at dinner.

Mrs. Harding, however, refusing to desert the post, was seated by the bedside, reading to her husband, when at 7:10 o'clock the President suddenly collapsed. His breathing, which had been quick ever since the illness overtook him, suddenly became spasmodic. Mrs. Harding, leaving the nurse to take whatever steps they could in the emergency, ran to the door of the presidential suite.

"Get the doctors," she called, as she ran part way into the almost deserted corridor. A secret service operative was seated about twenty feet down the hall. She hurriedly told the secret service man that the President had had a sudden and seemingly severe relapse, and begged the detective to try to locate Doctor Boone or any of the other physicians.

The secret service man took up the search for the physicians, while Mrs. Harding returned to the bedside. They located Doctor Sawyer at once.

Hoover Arrives Quickly.

Word of the President's sudden turn for the worse spread through the hotel and efforts were launched at once to try to locate the members of his official party.

Herbert Hoover, secretary of commerce and one of the closest cabinet members to the President, was the first of the cabinet members to reach the bedside. He hurried into the corridor, already aware that the President's life was ebbing fast, and the door to the suite closed behind him. A short time after he came out. He was completely broken up and could not speak to the newspaper men as they gathered around him on his way down to his own quarters. Tears were running down his cheeks and he seemed to be stunned by grief as he made his way to the elevator.

Mayor James Rolph of San Francisco was the next to arrive, and he, too, after a visit to the death room, was inarticulate.

Official Statement.

It was about twenty minutes from the time Mr. Harding was stricken (7:10 p. m.) until he died (7:30). The circumstance is told briefly in the following formal announcement:

"The President died at 7:30 p. m. Mrs. Harding and the two nurses, Miss Ruth Powderly and Miss Sue Drusser, were in the room at the time. Mrs. Harding was reading to the President when utterly without warning a slight shudder passed through his frame, he collapsed, and all recognized that the end had come. A stroke of apoplexy was the cause of his death.

"Within a few moments all of the President's official party had been summoned."

Dr. Boone said later that Miss Powderly looked at the President while Mrs. Harding was reading to him and was struck by a great improvement in the patient's appearance.

"Doesn't he look fine?" she said, turning to Mrs. Harding.

Then the nurse turned back to look at the President to verify her comment. Mrs. Harding looked, too. They saw a shudder pass over the sick man's frame. That marked the stroke that produced death.

The following telegram from the members of the cabinet who are here was immediately sent to Vice President Coolidge, Chief Justice Taft, and those members of the cabinet who were not in San Francisco:

"The President died at 7:30 p. m. from a stroke of cerebral apoplexy. The end came peacefully and without warning.

"DAUGHERTY,
"WORK,
"WALLACE,
"HOOVER."

A Shocking Surprise.

Nothing could have been a more shocking surprise. But an hour earlier General Sawyer had been telling newspaper men that Mr. Harding had had the best day since he became seriously ill the preceding Saturday. He said that the President had definitely entered upon the stage of convalescence and that everything went to show that Mr. Harding was on the road to ultimate recovery.

The members of the official party—those who had accompanied the President and Mrs. Harding—had no warning that the President was in danger. They, like the newspaper men, had been assured that a fatal termination of the President's illness was a thing not to be expected, in view of his apparent improvement—the evident lessening of serious symptoms—in the last 48 hours.

George B. Christian, Jr., secretary to the President and his devoted friend, was in Los Angeles with Mrs. Christian. He had gone there at the President's solicitation to read at a Masonic gathering an address which the President had prepared in the expectation that he would deliver it in person.

The newspaper men had an engagement with General Sawyer for 8 o'clock. He was to tell them then how the President was progressing toward recovery. The bulletin came at 7:30. Instead of informing them that the President's condition continued to improve it gave them the astounding information that he was dead.

Regarding the manner in which Mrs. Harding sustained the shock, an official statement given to the press by Judson D. Welliver of the White House staff, a member of the President's official party, said:

"Mrs. Harding, who from the beginning of the President's illness had expressed complete confidence in his recovery, did not break down. On the other hand, she continued, as from the beginning, the bravest member of the group. When it was realized that the President had actually passed away, she turned to those in the room, whose concern had turned to her, and said: 'I am not going to break down.'"

COOLIDGE WELL EQUIPPED FOR PRESIDENTIAL DUTIES

President Calvin Coolidge is perhaps better equipped by experience to take up his administrative duties in the White House than was any of his predecessors who have been called to that high office by the death of a president.

He has kept throughout the Harding administration closely advised as to the problems of the federal government and has assisted in shaping administration policy by his constant attendance at cabinet meetings.

Although vice presidents usually have no other duties to perform than that of presiding over the senate, casting the deciding vote when that body finds itself in a tie, Mr. Coolidge absented himself from its sessions every Tuesday and Friday to participate in the cabinet deliberations. Thus he became familiar not only with all angles of the major public questions, but also with the reasons actuating the President in his decisions.

CABINET TELLS OF GREAT LOSS

Members Say Harding Died as Result of His Unselfish Attention to Duty.

SOUGHT TO END BITTERNESS

Secretary Hoover Pays Beautiful Tribute to Character and Ability of Late Chief—Praise by Daugherty.

San Francisco, Cal., Aug. 4.—President Harding's collapse was ascribed by Secretary Hoover to his "generous and unselfish" outpouring of service and the application at all times of "geniality and good will to his tremendous tasks."

"The Almighty has taken the President from his work," Mr. Hoover said. "There is loss to the nation of a great leader and to many thousands a beloved personal friend. At my first meeting with him during the war his greeting was, 'Neighbor, I want to be helpful.' Be helpful to his neighbor was Warren Harding's ideal. He envisaged the whole American people as homefolks and neighbors. He loved to think and talk on what made good neighbors. He liked to feel of America as a good neighbor in the world.

"He came to the presidency with the burden of reconstruction; in a time of high national emotion, of bitter prejudice, of deep conflict in thought, of unparalleled dislocation of economic life, of unemployment. It was his determination to soften anger and to secure progress and healing through helpfulness and patient conciliation.

"He felt deeply that hard driving would open unhealable breaches among our people. He applied geniality and good will to his tremendous tasks in a way that amounted to genius. But underneath was resolute moral courage and steadfastness. He was the man needed for our times. He became the rallying point of constructive forces in our country."

Statements also were issued by the other cabinet officer. That of Attorney General Daugherty said:

"My personal relations with the late President, aside from my official association, were such, and my admiration and deep affection for this distinguished man so great, that, for the present at least, I know I will be excused from saying more than this."

"A loyal friend, a loving husband, a great President has been summoned," said Secretary Work. "Since the death of Lincoln, our nation has not lost so powerful a factor for safety. It is true, of course, that in all national crises, a great leader has been brought forward. Such men were not self-proclaimed, but a providence sought them out for a distressed people, as President Harding was found for us."

French Airman Shatters Record Held by American

Paris, Aug. 2.—Sadi Lecointe captured the world's altitude record, previously held by Lieut. J. A. Macready, an American, when he flew to a height of 11,000 meters, about 37,000 feet.

The previous world's altitude record was made by Lieutenant Macready on Sept. 28, 1921, when he attained a height recorded as 34,509.5 feet. News dispatches at that time credited Macready with a height of 40,800 feet, but official tests of the air instruments showed it to be 34,509.5 feet, a little over six and one-half miles.

Court Holds That War in Ireland Has Ceased to Be

Dublin, Aug. 2.—The Dublin court of appeal granted a writ of habeas corpus for the release of two prisoners interned as being dangerous to the state. The prisoners are Mrs. Connolly O'Brien and Mr. Eamon Donnelly. The judges held that, in view of existing conditions, there is no longer a state of war in the country.

Counsel for the government fought the motion, holding that the release would be dangerous, as a state of rebellion still exists.

English Newspaper Highly Praises President Harding

London, Aug. 1.—In a sympathetic editorial, earnestly hoping for President Harding's recovery, the Daily Mail says British interest in the President's case is personal as well as official. The editorial adds: "He has earned title to remembrance in the history of the world, as well as that of the republic, and has held his place not unworthily in that famous line of democratic rulers that runs from Washington through Adams, Monroe, Lincoln and Roosevelt."

Calvin Coolidge took the oath as President of the United States at Plymouth, Vt., at 2:47 a. m. Friday, August 3. The ceremony took place in the living room of the residence of the new President's father, John C. Coolidge. The oath of office was administered by the father, who is a notary public. The text of the presidential oath had been telephoned to Mr. Coolidge at Plymouth from the White House.

Statement by New Chief.

President Coolidge received the news of the death of President Harding and of his own elevation to the presidency at ten minutes before midnight, standard time, Thursday.

Mr. Coolidge received the first news through telegrams from George C. Christian, Jr., secretary to President Harding.

PRESIDENT CALVIN COOLIDGE

Mr. Coolidge issued the following statement:

"Reports have reached me, which I fear are correct, that President Harding is gone. The world has lost a great and good man. I mourn his loss. He was my chief and my friend. It will be my purpose to carry out the policies which he has begun for the service of the American people and for meeting their responsibilities wherever they may arise.

"For this purpose, I shall seek the co-operation of all those who have been associated with the President during his term of office. Those who have given their efforts to assist him I wish to remain in office, that they may assist me.

"I have faith that God will direct the destinies of our nation."

The following telegram was sent to Mrs. Harding:

"Plymouth, Vt., Aug. 3, 1923.

"Mrs. Warren G. Harding. San Francisco, Cal.: We offer you our deepest sympathy. May God bless you and keep you.

"CALVIN COOLIDGE,
"GRACE COOLIDGE."

Message Tells of Death.

The telegram announcing the death of the President was as follows:

"Palace hotel, San Francisco, Cal., Aug. 3, 1923.—Mr. Calvin Coolidge, Plymouth, Vt.: The President died, instantaneously and without warning, while conversing with members of his family, at 7:30 p. m. His physicians report that death was apparently due to some brain embolism, probably an apoplexy.

"GEORGE B. CHRISTIAN, JR.,
"Secretary."

This telegram was brought to the Coolidge home at Plymouth Notch by W. A. Perkins of Bridgewater, who owns the telephone line running from Bridgewater to Plymouth. About five minutes later newspaper men arrived in Ludlow.

A drive of thirty miles through the mountains brought them to the Coolidge summer home.

Mr. Coolidge and Mrs. Coolidge had retired about an hour before the death messages were received. Ten minutes after the arrival of the newspaper men Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge came downstairs into the sitting room of the Coolidge home. Mr. Coolidge was dressed in a black sack suit and wore a black necktie. Mrs. Coolidge wore a black and white gown, white shoes and stockings. Mr. Coolidge was very pale and showed deep regret for President Harding's death. He seated himself at a table, while Mrs. Coolidge brought a lamp and read the telegrams he had received.

He then called his assistant secretary, Irwin Geisser, and dictated to him his statement and the telegram to Mrs. Harding.

Mrs. Coolidge Weeps.

In the meantime people were arriving from all directions. Mr. Coolidge, seeing the house becoming crowded, gave orders that an adjoining house be opened for use as press headquarters.

Meanwhile, the new first lady of the land sat weeping softly and exclaiming in sympathy for the bereaved first lady in San Francisco.

"What a blow—what a terrible blow to poor Mrs. Harding," she said. "She had had such a heavy burden, in her own illness, to bear up under—and now this!"

Finally Secretary Geisser returned with the press copies of the statements, and pushing back the old photograph album and the family Bible on the center table, Mrs. Coolidge busied herself with the work of helping distribute them.

The newspaper men had scarcely gotten out of sight when another telegraph messenger arrived with a copy of the presidential oath from Washington. In the same sitting room with its hand-braided rugs, its clutter of venerable colonial furniture, its old wood stove and its family Bible—Calvin Coolidge received the oath of office from his father, and became America's thirtieth president.

Calvin Coolidge is a quiet, taciturn man, known to his friends as "Silent Cal."

For more than twenty years prior to his election as vice president he had been in political life, starting almost immediately after finishing college. His first political office was in the city council of Northampton, Mass., where he had settled. For years he held various offices in that city, including those of city solicitor and mayor; then he was elected to the Massachusetts house of representatives. Later he won a seat in the state senate and was its president.

Coolidge was lieutenant governor of Massachusetts and in 1919 was elected to the governorship in the first campaign won by the Republican party in several years. He was governor for two years. It was during this term he during his term as governor that he first attained nation-wide prominence. This was in connection with the policemen's strike in Boston. He took firm control of the situation, ordered the state guard to patrol the streets, and kept down rioting, taking the stand that law and order must be preserved. The strike was a complete failure.

He was mentioned as a possibility for the presidential nomination prior to the 1920 campaign, but he made a public announcement that he would not consider the nomination. His nomination and election to the vice presidency followed.

Mr. Coolidge comes of a long line of New England ancestors who came to America in 1630, settling near Watertown, Mass. President Coolidge has two sons, Calvin, Jr., and John. Neither he nor his wife has been particularly active socially. A man of simple tastes, a thorough student, a hard worker, he is looked upon by his friends as a clear-headed, solid American. Although shy, he remains unperturbed no matter how exciting the situation may be. The keynote of his nature is dependability. In dress he is conservative, usually the opposite of extravagant, but always immaculate.

In Washington Mr. Coolidge has been ranked as a clear thinker, careful in speech, a fair mixer—as aggressive as any vice president can be.

PASTURES FAILED JULY 17

Prodution Being Mainained By Feeding Corn Silage

"Put up a silo and fill it to capacity and if silage lasts until next summer so much the better, a good 'decrease in production insurance policy will be paid for," Earl Weaver, head of the Iowa State College says to the dairy farmers of Iowa. The milk cows at the college July 17 on which date the pastures began to get so dry that they could not be depended upon to furnish a supply of sufficient succulent forage.

"Of course," says Mr. Weaver, we are not getting better results than we did earlier in the season on succulent pasture. This is due partly to a difference in feeds but to a large extent to the hot weather and the flies, two factors that must be reckoned wih in milk production.

"However, experience shows that a good silo is one of the very best investments for the farmer who milks cows especially for those men who depend upon pastures for the bulk of their summer feed. Summer ensilage feeding brings results," Mr. Weaver says.

IOWA GRAIN TO 20 TERMINALS

Most People Think It Goes to Chicago; Ames Investigator Says, No.

Where does Iowa grain go?

"Chicago," is the answer most people give to this question without a moments consideration.

"Quite to the contrary," says Frank Robotka of the agricultural economics department of Iowa State College. "Iowa grain goes to nearly a score of primary terminal markets, in varying proportions of course. Only 50 of the 511 famers' elevators operating in this state ship their grain to a single terminal. Ten of them ship to six terminals and 159 ship to three terminals."

These terminals are situated all the way from the middle west to Buffalo, N. Y. and Boston, Mass., according to Mr. Robotka, who has been associated with Dr. E. G. Norse in the study of the farmer's elevator movement in Iowa. The results of the survey will be published in a second experiment station bulletin, one already having been published and given wide distribution.

'Nine tenths of the farmers' elevators in Iowa at the time this survey was made had either none or only one other elevator competing with them at the local station," Mr. Robotka says. "One of the 511 elevators had nine competing elevators in adjoining towns while 115 had four and 18 had only one competitor at a nearby station.

"Important consideration from the standpoint of the farmers' elevator are the nature of the farmers' business and the proportion of grain to sidelines." It is in a measure what sidelines are better ones to carry. Methods of financing along with the factors that influence the cost of operation will be discussed."

The business places of Klemme will be closed Friday from 3:00 to 4:00 P. M. during the funeral services of President Harding.

The STORMIZING of motor cylinders has developed until it is now a definite specialty in hundreds of shops equipped with STORMIZING machines with which cylinders may be re-finished to a slight over-size, and as ACCURATELY as the motor builder ground them originally.

These cylinders, re-finished to a slight over-size, are then fitted with properly designed pistons, also of the correct over-size, together with new piston pins and rings.

The result is practically a new motor.

Rehabilitate your motor in this way and watch your power, flexibility, pick-up, gasoline economy and general satisfaction return to the original standard.

Farmers: Patronize Yourself

There is sometimes a wide margin between the costs of the producer to that of the consumer. Stop to think of the grain produced by the farmer which is sold and finally comes back in little packages of breakfast foods at an increased cost of several hundred percent due to the various manufacturing costs.

Right here is where the farmer comes in when he owns, patronizes and helps operate a co-operative creamery. His raw product (cream) is manufactured into a finished product (butter) at a small cost. It brings a good price at home and on our eastern markets. (The profit stays at home.)

By selling your cream to us Mr. Farmer, you are patronizing yourself as a producer, manufacturer and consumer.

You will find it pays to stick to your local creamery which enables you to get the HIGHEST MARKET PRICE FOR YOUR CREAM. Just ask the farmer who has lived in a community where there was no creamery, and he will tell you to—

Bonita.

Having exhausted all the resources of the mountain, such that had interest for them, Madeline's guests settled quietly down for a rest, which Madeline knew would soon end in a desire for civilized comforts. They were almost tired of roughing it. Helen's discontent manifested itself in her remark, "I guess nothing is going to happen, after all."

Madeline awaited their pleasure in regard to the breaking of camp; and meanwhile, as none of them cared for exertion, she took her walks without them, sometimes accompanied by one of the cowboys, always by the hounds. One day, while walking alone, before she realized it she had gone a long way down a dim trail leading among the rocks. It was the middle of a summer afternoon, and all about her were shadows of the crags and the sunlit patches. The quiet was undisturbed. She went on and on, blind to the fact that she was perhaps going too far from camp, but loving it because she was sure of her way back, and enjoying the wild, craggy recesses that were new to her. Finally she came out upon a bank that broke abruptly into a beautiful little glade. Here she sat down to rest before undertaking the return trip.

Suddenly Russ, the keener of the hounds, raised his head and growled. Madeline feared he might have scented a mountain-lion or wild-cat. She quieted him and carefully looked around. The little glade was green and grassy, with here a pine tree, there a boulder. The outlet seemed to lead down into a wilderness of canyons and ridges. Looking in this direction, Madeline saw the slight, dark figure of a woman coming stealthily along under the pines. Madeline was amazed, and a little frightened, for that stealthy walk from tree to tree was suggestive of secrecy, if nothing worse. Presently the woman was joined by a tall man who carried a package, which he gave to her. They came on into the glade and appeared to be talking earnestly. In another moment Madeline recognized Stewart. She had a greater feeling of surprise than had at first been hers. But for the next moment she scarcely thought at all as she merely watched the couple approaching. In a flash came back her former curiosity as to Stewart's strange absences from camp, and then with the return of her doubt of him the recognition of the woman. The small, dark head, the brown face, the big eyes Madeline now saw distinctly—belonged to the Mexican girl Bonita. Stewart had met her there. This was the secret of his lonely trips, taken since he had come to work for Madeline. This secluded glade was a rendezvous. He had her hidden there. Quietly Madeline arose, with a gesture to the dogs, and went back along the trail toward camp. Succeeding her surprise was a feeling of sorrow that Stewart's regeneration had not been complete. Sorrow gave place to intolerable distrust that while she had been romancing about this cowboy, planning of her good influence over him, he had been merely base. Somehow it stung her. Stewart had been willing to her, she thought, yet she had been proud of him. She tried to believe the thing, to be fair to him, but every instinctive tendency was to repel him, and all pertaining to him, in her thoughts. And her effort at sympathy, at extenuation, failed utterly before her pride. Exerting her will-power, she dismissed Stewart from her mind.

Madeline did not think of him again that afternoon, when, as she was leaving her tent to join several of her guests, Stewart appeared suddenly in her path.

"Miss Hammond, I saw your tracks on the trail," he began, eagerly, but his tone was easy and natural. "I'm thinking—well, maybe you sure got my idea—"

"I do not wish for an explanation," interrupted Madeline.

Stewart gave a slight start. His face had a semblance of the old, reckless audacity. As he looked down at her it subtly changed.

"That effrontery, Madeline thought, to face her before her guests with an explanation of his conduct! Suddenly she felt an inward flash of fire that was pain, so strange, so incomprehensible that her mind whirled. Then anger possessed her, not at Stewart, but herself, that anything could rouse in her a raw emotion. He stood there, fearfully cool, serene, with level, mighty eyes upon Stewart; but inwardly she was burning with rage and shame.

"I'm sure not going to have you misjudge—" He began passionately, but broke off, and a slow, dull crimson crept over the healthy red-brown of his neck and cheeks.

"What you do or think, Stewart, is no concern of mine."

"Then—Miss Hammond! You don't know—" faltered Stewart.

The crimson receded from his face, leaving it pale. His eyes were appealing. They had a kind of timid look that struck Madeline even in her anger. There was something boyish about him then. He took a step forward and reached out with his hand open-palmed in a gesture that was humble, yet held a certain dignity.

"But listen. Never mind now what you—you think about me. There's a good reason—"

"I have no wish to hear your reason."

"But you ought," he persisted.

"Sir!"

Stewart underwent another swift change. He started violently. A dark tide shaded his face and a glitter leaped to his eyes. He took two strides—loomed over her.

"I'm not thinking about myself," he thundered. "Will you listen?"

"No," she replied; and there was freezing hauteur in her voice. With a slight gesture of dismissal, unmistakable in its finality, she turned her back upon him. Then she joined her guests.

Stewart stood perfectly motionless. Then slowly he began to lift his right hand in which he held his sombrero. He swept it up and up, high over his head. His tall form towered. With fierce suddenness he flung his sombrero down. He leaped at his black horse and dragged him to where his saddle lay. With one pitch he tossed the saddle upon the horse's back. His strong hand flashed at girths and straps. Every action was swift, decisive, fierce. Bounding for his bridle, which hung over a bush, he ran against a cowboy who awkwardly tried to avoid the onslaught.

"Get out of my way!" he yelled.

Then with the same savage haste he adjusted the bridle on his horse.

"Mebbe you better hold on a minnit, Gene, ole feller," said Monty Price.

"Monty, do you want me to brain you?" said Stewart, with the short, hard ring in his voice.

"Now, considerin' the high class of my brains, I oughter be real careful to keep 'em," replied Monty. "You can betcher life, Gene, I ain't goin' to git in front of you. But I jest says—Listen!"

Stewart raised his dark face. Everybody listened. And everybody heard the rapid beat of a horse's hoofs. The sun had set, but the park was light. Nels appeared down the trail, and his horse was running. In another moment he was in the circle, pulling his bay back to a sliding halt. He leaped off abreast of Stewart.

Madeline saw and felt a difference in Nels' presence.

"What's up, Gene?" he queried, sharply.

Nels' long arm shot out, and his hand fell upon Stewart, holding him down.

"Shore I'm sorry," said Nels, slowly. "Then you was goin' to hit the trail?"

"I am going to. Let go, Nels."

"Shore you ain't goin', Gene?"

"Let go, d—n you!" cried Stewart, as he wrestled free.

"What's wrong?" asked Nels, lifting his hand again.

"Man! Don't touch me!"

Nels stepped back instantly. He seemed to become aware of Stewart's

"What You Do or Think, Stewart, Is No Concern of Mine."

white, wild passion. Again Stewart moved to mount.

"Nels, don't make me forget we've been friends," he said.

"Shore I ain't fergettin'," replied Nels. "An' I resign my job right here an' now!"

His strange speech checked the mounting cowboy. Stewart stepped down from the stirrup. Then their hard faces were still and cold while their eyes locked glances.

Madeline was as much startled by Nels' speech as Stewart. Quick to note a change in these men, she now sensed one that was unfathomable.

"Resign?" questioned Stewart.

"Shore. What'd you think I'd do under circumstances sich as has come up?"

"But see here, Nels, I won't stand for it."

"You're not my boss no more, an' I ain't beholdin' to Miss Hammond, neither. I'm my own boss, an' I'll do as I please. Sabe, senor?"

Nels' words were at variance with the meaning in his face.

"Gene, you sent me on a little scout down in the mountains, didn't you?"

"Yes, I did," replied Stewart, with a new sharpness in his voice.

"Wal, shore you was so good an' right in your figgerin', as opposed to mine, that I'm sick with admirin' of you. If you hedn't sent me—wal, I'm reckonin' somethin' might hev happened. As it is we're shore up against a hell of a proposition!"

How significant was the effect of his words upon all the cowboys! Stewart made a fierce and violent motion, terrible where his other motions had been but passionate. Monty leaped straight up into the air in a singular action as suggestive of surprise as it was of wild acceptance of menace. Like a stalking giant Nick Steele strode over to Nels and Stewart. The other cowboys rose silently, without a word.

Madeline and her guests, in a little group, watched and listened, unable to divine what all this strange talk and action meant.

"Hold on, Nels, they don't need to hear it," said Stewart, hoarsely, as he waved a hand toward Madeline's silent group.

"Wal, I'm sorry, but I reckon they'd as well know fust as last. Mebbe thet yearnin' wish of Miss Helen's fer somethin' to happen will come true. Shore I—"

"Cut out the joshin'," rang out Monty's strident voice.

It had as decided an effect as any preceding words or action. Perhaps it was the last thing needed to transform these men, doing unaccustomed duty as escorts of beautiful women, to their natural state as men of the wild.

"Tell us what's what," said Stewart, cool and grim.

"Don Carlos an' his guerrillas are campin' on the trails thet lead up here. They've got them trails blocked. By tomorrer they'd hed us corralled. Mebbe they meant to surprise us. He's got a lot of Greasers an' outlaws. They're well armed. Now, what do they mean? You-all can figger it out to suit yourselves. Mebbe the Don wants to pay a sociable call on our ladies. Mebbe his gang is some hungry, as usual. Mebbe they want to steal a few hosses, or anythin' they can lay hands on. Mebbe they mean wuss, too. Now, my idea is this, an' mebbe it's wrong. I long since separated from love with Greasers. Thet black-faced Don Carlos has got a deep game. Thet two-bit of a revolution is hevin' hard times. The rebels want American intervention. They'd stretch any point to make trouble. We're only ten miles from the border. Suppose them guerrillas got our crowd across thet border? The United States cavalry would foller. You-all know what thet'd mean. Mebbe Don Carlos' mind works thet way. Mebbe it don't. I reckon we'll know soon. An' now, Stewart, whatever the Don's game is, shore you're the man to outfigger him. Mebbe it's just as well you're good an' mad about somethin'. An' I'm going to resign my job because I want to feel unbeholdin' to anybody. Shore it struck me long since thet the old days hed come back for a little spell, an' there I was trailin' a promise not to hurt any Greaser."

CHAPTER XVII
Don Carlos.

Stewart took Nels, Monty and Nick Steele aside out of earshot, and they evidently entered upon an earnest colloquy. Presently the other cowboys were called. They all talked more or less, but the deep voice of Stewart predominated over the others. Then the consultation broke up, and the cowboys scattered.

"Rustle, you Indians!" ordered Stewart.

The ensuing scene of action was not reassuring to Madeline and her friends. They were quiet, awaiting some one to tell them what to do. At the offset the cowboys appeared to have forgotten Madeline. Some of them ran off into the woods, others into the open, grassy places, where they rounded up the horses and burros. Several cowboys spread tarpaulins upon the ground and began to select and roll small packs, evidently for hurried travel. Nels mounted his horse to ride down the trail. Monty and Nick Steele went off into the grove, leading their horses. Stewart climbed up a steep jumble of stone between two sections of low, cracked cliff back of the camp.

Madeline's friends all importuned her: Was there real danger? Were the guerrillas coming? Would a start be made at once for the ranch? Why had the cowboys suddenly become so different? Madeline answered as best she could; but her replies were only conjecture, and modified to allay the fears of her guests. Helen was in a white glow of excitement.

Soon the cowboys appeared riding barebacked horses, driving in others and the burros. Some of these horses were taken away and evidently hidden in deep recesses between the crags. The string of burros were packed and sent off down the trail in charge of a cowboy. Nick Steele and Monty returned. Then Stewart appeared, clambering down the break between the cliffs.

His next move was to order all the baggage belonging to Madeline and her guests taken up the cliff. This was strenuous toil, requiring the need of lassoes to haul up the effects.

"Get ready to climb," said Stewart, turning to Madeline's party.

"Where?" asked Helen.

He waved his hand at the ascent to be made. Exclamations of dismay followed his gesture.

"Mr. Stewart, is there danger?" asked Dorothy; and her voice trembled.

This was the question Madeline had upon her lips to ask Stewart, but she could not speak it.

"No, there's no danger," replied Stewart, "but we're taking precautions we all agreed on as best."

Dorothy whispered that she believed Stewart lied. Castleton asked another question, and then Harvey followed suit. Mrs. Beck made a timid query.

"Please keep quiet and do as you're told," said Stewart, bluntly.

At this juncture, when the last of the baggage was being hauled up the cliff, Monty approached Madeline and removed his sombrero. His black face seemed the same, yet this was a vastly changed Monty.

"Miss Hammond, I'm givin' notice I resign my job," he said.

"Monty! What do you mean? What does Nels mean now, when danger threatens?"

"We jest quit. That's all," replied Monty, tersely. He was stern and somber; he could not stand still; his eyes roved everywhere.

Castleton jumped up from the log where he had been sitting, and his face was very red.

"Mr. Price, does all this blooming fuss mean we are to be robbed or attacked or abducted by a lot of ragamuffin guerrillas?"

"You've called the bet."

Dorothy turned a very pale face toward Monty.

"Mr. Price, you wouldn't—you couldn't desert us now? You and Mr. Nels—"

"Desert you?" asked Monty, blankly.

"Yes, desert us. Leave us when we may need you so much, with something dreadful coming."

Monty uttered a short, hard laugh as he bent a strange look upon the girl.

"Me an' Nels is purty much scared, an' we're goin' to slope. Miss Dorothy, bein' as we've rustled round so much, it sorta hurts us to see nice young girls dragged off by the hair."

Dorothy uttered a little cry and then became hysterical. Castleton for once was fully aroused.

"By Gad! You and your partner are a couple of blooming cowards. Where now is that courage you boasted of?"

Monty's dark face expressed extreme sarcasm.

"Dook, in my time I've seen some bright fellers, but you take the cake. It's most marvelous how bright you are. Figger'n' me an' Nels so correct. Say, Dook, if you don't git rustled off to Mexico an' roped to a cactus bush you'll hev a swell story fer your English chums. Bah Jove! You'll tell 'em how you seen two old-time gun-men run like scared jack-rabbits from a lot of Greasers. Like h—l you will!"

"Monty, shut up!" yelled Stewart, as he came hurriedly up. Then Monty slouched away, cursing to himself.

Madeline and Helen, assisted by Castleton, worked over Dorothy, and with some difficulty quieted her. Stewart passed several times without noticing them, and Monty, who had been so ridiculously eager to pay every little attention to Dorothy, did not see her at all. Rude it seemed; in Monty's case more than that. Madeline hardly knew what to make of it.

Stewart directed cowboys to go to the head of the open place in the cliff and let down lassoes. Then, with little waste of words, he urged the women toward this rough ladder of stones.

"We want to hide you," he said, when they demurred. "If the guerrillas come we'll tell them you've all gone down to the ranch. If we have to fight you'll be safe up there."

Helen stepped boldly forward and let Stewart put the loop of a lasso round her and tighten it. He waved his hand to the cowboys above.

"Just walk up, now," he directed Helen.

It proved to the watchers to be an easy, safe and rapid means of scaling the steep passage. The men climbed up without assistance. Edith Wayne and Madeline climbed last, and, once up, Madeline saw a narrow bench, thick with shrubs and overshadowed by huge, leaning crags. There were holes in the rock, and dark fissures leading back. It was a rough, wild place. Tarpaulins and bedding were then hauled up, and food and water. The cowboys spread comfortable beds in several of the caves, and told Madeline and her friends to be as quiet as possible, not to make a light, and to sleep dressed, ready for travel at a moment's notice.

Madeline deplored the discomfort and distress, but felt no real alarm. She was more inclined to evasive kindness here than to sincerity, for she had a decided uneasiness. The swift change in the manner and looks of her cowboys had been a shock to her. The last glance she had of Stewart's face, then stern, almost sad, and haggard with worry, remained to augment her foreboding.

Darkness appeared to drop swiftly down; the coyotes began their haunting, mournful howls; the stars showed and grew brighter; the wind moaned through the tips of the pines. The cowboys below had built a fire, and the light from it rose in a huge, fan-shaped glow. Madeline peered down from the cliff. The distance was short, and occasionally she could distinguish a word spoken by the cowboys. They were unconcernedly cooking and eating.

Presently Nick Steele silenced the campfire circle by raising a warning hand. The cowboys bent their heads, listening. Madeline listened with all her might. She heard one of the hounds whine, then the faint beat of horse's hoofs. The beat of hoofs grew louder, entered the grove, then the circle of light. The rider was Nels. He dismounted, and the sound of his low voice just reached Madeline.

"Gene, it's Nels. Something doin'," Madeline heard one of the cowboys call, softly.

"Send him over," replied Stewart.

Nels stalked away from the fire.

"See here, Nels, the boys are all right, but I don't want them to know

"By Gad! You and Your Partner Are a Couple of Blooming Cowards."

everything about this mix-up," said Stewart, as Nels came up. "Did you find the girl?"

Madeline guessed that Stewart referred to the Mexican girl Bonita.

"No. But I met"—Madeline did not catch the name—"an' he was wild. He was with a forest-ranger. An' they said Pat Hawe had trailed her an' was takin' her down under arrest."

Stewart muttered deep under his breath, evidently cursing.

"Wonder why he didn't come on up here?" he queried, presently. "He can see a trail."

"Wal, Gene, Pat knowed you was here all right, fer thet ranger said Pat hed wind of the guerrillas, an' Pat said if Don Carlos didn't kill you—which he hoped he'd do—then it'd be time enough to put you in jail when you come down."

"He's dead set to arrest me, Nels."

"An' he'll do it, like the old lady who kept tavern out West. Gene, the reason thet red-faced coyote didn't trail you up here is because he's scared. He allus was scared of you. But I reckon he's shore scared to death of me an' Monty."

"Well, we'll take Pat in his turn. The thing now is, when will that Greaser stalk us, and what'll we do when he comes?"

"My boy, there's only one way to handle a Greaser. I shore told you thet. He means rough toward us. He'll come smilin' up, all soci'ble like, insinuatin' an' sweeter 'n a woman. But he's treacherous; he's wuss than an Indian. An', Gene, we know for a positive fact how his gang hev been operatin' between these hills an' Agua Prieta. We know jest about what thet rebel war down there amounts to. It's guerrilla war, an' shore some harvest time fer a lot of cheap thieves an' outcasts."

"Oh, you're right, Nels. I'm not disputing that," replied Stewart. "If it wasn't for Miss Hammond and the other women, I'd rather enjoy seeing you and Monty open up on that bunch. I'm thinkin' I'd be glad to meet Don Carlos. But Miss Hammond! Why, Nels, such a woman as she is would never recover from the sight of real gun-play, let alone any stunts with a rope. These eastern women are different. I'm not belittling our western women. It's in the blood. Miss Hammond is—is—"

"Shore she is," interrupted Nels; "but she's got a d—n sight more spunk than you think she has, Gene Stewart. I'm no thick-skulled cow. I'd hate somethin' powerful to hev Miss Hammond see any rough work, let alone me an' Monty startin' somethin'. An' me an' Monty'll stick to you, Gene, as long as seems reasonable. Mind, ole feller, beggin' your pardon, you're shore stuck on Miss Hammond, an' overtender not to hurt her feelin's or make her sick by lettin' some blood. We're in bad here, an' mebbe we'll hev to fight. Sabe, senor? Wal, if we do you can jest gamble thet Miss Hammond'll be game.

ROOSEVELT LETTER TO POSTS

Facsimile of Former President's Personal Message to Men in Trenches Is Sent Out.

A copy of the only personal message ever prepared by former President Theodore Roosevelt for American soldiers in France, written on the day he was apprised of the death of his son, Quentin, has been sent to every post of the American Legion, in the form of a specially prepared facsimile of the original message. This letter was prepared for the soldiers of America and was to be conveyed to them by Cass Connaway of Buffalo, N. Y., who was unable to deliver the words of Roosevelt because of war duties.

Through the 11,000 posts of the American Legion Mr. Connaway has been able to complete distribution of the message, and it will be framed in Legion homes, presented to libraries and museums, that all Americans may read of the feelings of a fighter to the fighting men of America.

Connaway was an attorney in Indianapolis before the war. His two sons enlisted, and his wife took up Red Cross work. When he found he was the only one of the family not in service he closed his office and volunteered as a "Y" hut secretary, unable to enter the army on account of his age.

Before he was ordered to France, Connaway conceived the idea of carrying a message to the Hoosier boys at the front, telling them of how they would be welcomed on their return to the United States. Gov. James P. Goodrich of Indiana prepared a splendid message, as did Booth Tarkington, Meredith Nicholson, George Ade and other well-known Indianans. Then Connaway enlarged on his original idea and wrote to the governors of every state for similar words to the men of their commonwealths in the trenches of France. All responded, and to these were added a tribute, penned in longhand, by Cardinal Gibbons.

On July 15, 1918, Mr. Connaway submitted his plan to former President Roosevelt. The day following, Quentin, his son, was killed as he flew over German lines, word being received with America July 17 of the death of the young aviator.

Connaway sailed for France and shortly after landing was assigned to duties with the legal division of the Y. M. C. A. He was unable to send the message direct to the men at the front, but succeeded in having it printed in the Paris edition of the London Daily Times, though few of the fighters were privileged to see it. Continued duties with the "Y" as chief of the claims division, judge advocate and chief of the legal division held up delivery of the message. Connaway then returned to the United States and was separated from the service to become managing director of the Buffalo real estate board.

Still feeling his obligation for delivery of the words from Mr. Roosevelt, Connaway sought permission from Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., now assistant secretary of the navy, for authority to issue the letter. Further permission was obtained from the Roosevelt Memorial association, which is gathering mementoes for presentation at Roosevelt house in New York city, the birthplace of the president, and where the original of the message will be placed.

Identical copies of the statement to the troops were prepared. Then the American Legion was appealed to as being the best means for distribution of the message and it went forward through the various posts of the organization.

The message follows:

"To the Soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces Overseas:

"I send my heartfelt greetings to you men at the front. You have made all of us who stay behind lift our heads high with pride by what you are doing. It is you men, and only you men, who are doing one vital work for the American people today. All good Americans at this time owe homage to the fighting men at the fighting front. What you are doing is vital for the honor and the interest, for the future welfare, and for the very existence, of our republic; and you are also battling for the liberty of every well-behaved civilized nation, big or little.

"I congratulate you on the great good fortune that is yours in that you now have the chance to endure hardship and peril for a great ideal and to render to our country the greatest of all service. I would give anything to be over with you.

"Faithfully yours,

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

FILMS GIVE WRONG IDEA OF AMERICA

Rapid Spectacles Shown in Europe Makes U. S. Look Like Bad-man's Land

LONDON:— Europeans entertain curious notions about life in the United States. Many of them get their impressions from American moving-pictures, which feature train robberies, bank hold-ups, social scandals, shooting affairs, exciting automobile episodes, and other equally sensational things.

"From personal observation of American films in British cinemas," says a writer in the London Evening News, "we reach the conclusion that America is a large country entirely surrounded by sin and sentiment. It is inhabited in the east by unscrupulous, but enormously sucessful, business men, who devote their nights to wandering in cabarets their ill-gotten gains the day before. In the west bad men rob stage coaches and banks, shoot sheriffs and their partners in crime, and spend a good deal of time rolling on the ground in attempts to gouge each other's eyes out.

"The north is peopled by bearded scoundrels, who go there to escape from the law, to steal mining claims, and to menace lonely girls snowbound in log cabins. The south is inhabitable for cacti, and half breeds. The last named are no particular use. They re just bad.

"The rich women of the east are culpable for the scantiness of their costume, the uncharitable attitude towards other women, and for their remarkable bedrooms. These are of enormous size, elaborately decorated and have at least one telephone, and an easy way of egress for heroines and egress for heroes.

"Sometimes the villian used one of these entrances and then the hero close throws a lamp at him and rings for the hero, who was lying awake waiting for the call."

"He dashes round in pajamas and automobile to her resuce just in time to wake up the household and is covered with suspicion.

"In the west and the south very little work is done . The men of the town hang around the 'store' all day long in case they are wanted for a fight, and the women gossip over gates so to be ready to run into the road and welcome home the blood-stained hero.

"America must be an awfully interesting place to live in; only few of us invertabrate Britons could stand the strain of such an exciting life. It isn't so much the amount of work the Americans do as the suddenness with which they do things. that must tell on them in time. Fortunes are made and home ruined in America on the screen in less time than the average Englishman takes to eat his breakfast."

SOME IMPORTANT LAST WORDS

"Iwonder if its loaded. I'll look down the barrel and see."

"Oh listen! That's the train whistle. Step on the acellator, and we will try to get across before it comes.

"They say the things can't possibly explode no matter, how much you throw them around.

"I wonder if this rope will hold my weight? "

"It's no fun swimming around in here.. I'm going out beyond the life lines."

"Which one of them is the third rail, anyway?"

"There's only one way to manage a mule. Walk right in back of him and surprise him.

"That firecracker must have been gone out. I'll light it again.

"Watch me skate out past the danger sign. I bet I can touch it."

"The traffic policeman think they own the city. They can't stop me. I'm going across the street now. Let the chauffers look out for me."

TEN COMMANDMENTS FOR GOSSIPS

By William K. Anderson

1. Thou shalt have no other desire above the truth.

2. Thou shalt not make unto thee any grievous imaginings or any unfounded rumors concerning any one who has departed to the heaven above, or who is still living on the earth beneath, or whom thou mayest think has been consigned unto the realm under the earth.

3. Thou shalt not besmirch the good name of thy neighbor for thine own gain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that doeth a trick like that.

4. Remember the code of honor and keep it—wholly. Six days shalt thou labor with thyself not to echo what "they say", and to make certain the truth of every "juicy bit" that thou are tempted o pass on, and he seventh thou shalt do likewise.

5. Honor thy father and thy mother and all the rest of the children of God that dwell in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

6. Thou shalt not kill thy neighbors good reputation.

Thou shalt not commit the sin of flattering thy friend to his face while whispering scandal behind his back.

8. Thou shalt not steal thy brother's happiness by everlastingly wagging thy busy tongue.

9. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

10. Thou mayest covet thy neighbor's good qualities— his honesty, his generousity, his kindness, and his courage; but thou shalt remember that thy attempts to flich from him his good name in order to win one thyself can only end in robbing thee of what little reputation thou mayest already possess.

LINCOLN CONCERN BUYS 3,200 ACRES OF LAND IN COUNTY

Proverty Consists of Eight Improved Half Sections of Land Near Here

One of the largest and most important farm land transctions in Iowa for many months is the recent purchase of Wood Brothers Corporation of Lincoln Nebraska of 3,200 acres in Cerro Gordo county, twenty-four miles southwest of Mason City. The property consists of eight improved half section farms and a section of pasture land, known as the W. E. Stone farms. The purchase was made from the heeirs of the Stone estate.

Mr. Stone acquired the property forty years ago and kept the land in natural grass until his death.Fourteen years eight sets of improvements were placed on the land. Groves of trees planted and about 2,400 acres were placed under cultivation. The property has since been held together by the heirs but it is understood that the new owners purpose dividing it into farms and disposing of it to indivdual owners.

Ths marks the passing of another of Iowa's extensve farm properties and the making of a dozen or more farms. It is in the line of agricultural progress and plays an important part in community buliding. The was brought about through a former Iowa Man, Frank D. Tomson, for fifteen years a resident of Cedar Rapids, now a director in the Woods Brothers Corpoation.

CONCERNING TAXES

Those who have to say about the expenditures of tax moneys frequently speak of the wastefulness of armies and navies. They wish, as does every one else, that such might be diverted to serve other purposes.

But as a rule they have very little to say about our standing army of tax collectors and spenders, is more than five times the size of our army and navy combined. In this connection the rectnt report of the taxation committee of he Michigan Banker's Associaion is particularly interesting.

The commitee asserts that, in the pas fifteen years, more than 1,000 curities are popular, and that the country to control the lives and business activities of our people, and that one individual in twleve of our population is supported by the tax paying public in one way or another. In the state of Michigan, 50 per cent of the wealth created every year goes to pay for government—state, local or national.

The United States government pays salaries to 700,000 civilians and the several states have more than twice that number on their payrolls. Add their families and dependents and you will understand the surprising totals and cost of our govermental housekeeping.

Is it any wonder that tax-free securities are popular, and thas to so many supposedly upright citizens are to be suspected of forgetfulness in the matter of tax rteurn?

Is it any wonder that the business men hold up heir hands in horror at the thought of government ownership or operation of utilities? — Evansville, Ind, Courier.

BOY SCOUT DROWNS IN CLEAR LAKE

MASON CITY, IOWA.— James Chism, a thirteen year old boy scout of Swaledale, was drowned in Clear Lake last Thursday when he attempted to swim to a boat anchored thirty feet from the diving board. Chism was 150 feet from the shore when he went down and he got a strangle hold on Leland Prichard, scoutmaster's son who was able to free himself only after a hard struggle.

Chism with eight other scouts was attending summer camp at Camp Roosevelt under the supervision of Rev. J. E. Prichard. scoutmaster.

WORLD'S SMALLEST CHURCH IN IOWA

Holds 8 People and Was Built By Descendents of Napoleonic Veteran

M'GREGOR. Ia., —Five miles southeast of Fort Atkinson is located a little stone chapel believed to be the smallest house of worship in the world. Its outside measurements are 12x20 feet and within its doors eight people may be seated in the four pews that flank the aisle leading to the tiny alter.

The chapel was built in 1883 by John Gartner and his son-in-law, F. J. Huber. Gartner, a French army veteran who marched to Moscow in the army of Napoleon and later took part in the battle of Waterloo, came to Fort Atkinson in 1848. The post which comprised a fort, a government Indian farm and a fur trading post, had been abondoned earlier in the year when the Indians were removed to Minnesota.

With six other families, Gartner settled at the fort and made a chapel of one of he log buildings of the fur trading post. When this was destroyed by fire forty years ago, the present chapel was built.

John Gartner and seventy other members of the family are buried in the cemetary at the rear of the church and every year on the 15th of June the Huber relatives meet in the little chapel of St. Anthony, as it is called, to honor the memory of their grandparents.

Needlessly Killed His Chickens.

We not in an exchange that the editor of the Tripoli Leader is very enthusiastic about stamping out tuberculosis and knows the disease appears in chickens as well in cattle and humans. He was told that a chicken afflicted with tuberculosis would first go lame, hobble around a short time and then die. Therefore, he kept close watch for lame chickens.

In the meantime it must be stated that he edior of he Leader is a chicken enhusiast. He has blooded flocks, nd is very proud of his birds. But he does not want any tuberculosis in his.

Last spring his best laying pullet went lame, and there was another her head off and burned the carcass. Shortly after, another fancy pulet went lme, and there was another slaughter and cremation. This kept up until the flock was pretty well cleaner out. At last however. he decided to give the carcass of a chick to the loal veterninarian to disover just how much tuberculosis there was in the bird. What was his chagrin and dismay to have the veterinarian tell him that his bird did not show a sign of tuberculosis, but that it was suffering from bumble foot, a disease caused by the chicken jumping from a high perch every morning and alighting on a cement floor. Now he puts straw covering over his cement floor—and no more tuberculosis. —Fenton Reporter.

COUNTRY MAN'S AUTOMOBILE

Many people seem to think that the possesssion of great numbers of automobiles by the country folks is a sign that they are making a lot of money and that the difficulties that the farmer is supposed to encounter are largely imaginary Many people living in outlying districts however can testify that mobile is an absolute necessity for them. With their old team of horses it might have taken them a day to get to market town and back again. But with the automobile they can usually do it in half the time. This is worth a great deal of money to the farmer now, with the high prices that must be paid for help. Gasoline and tires on his fliver are cheaper than the pay of a farm hand But when the use of an automobile is abused the upkeep may overballance their usefulness.

REAL OIL BOOM HITS HUMBOLDT

Drilling Started Under Direction Of Geologist Who Has "Oil-Detector"

Over at Humboldt they are getting excited over the breaking out of a real oil boom. It seems that the boom has been under progress since last spring, but it didn't become real healthy until last week, when an expert arrived with a drill and prepared to erect a derrick.

A geologist named Getz is back of the search for oil, using a machine of his own, which he says can detect the pressure of oil under the ground. If this machine doesn't lie, there is lots of oil around Humboldt.

Regarding this machine and the prospects of oil, the Humboldt Independent says:

"The writer can truthfully say that the operation of the instrument is quite mystifying, if no convincing, to say the least. It will not work in the hands of all persons. However it would work as sucessfully for Joe Myers, J. D. Meriss and Mr. Lindhart as for Mr. Getz. Several others tried it without results. Mr. Getz is a very pleasing, yet unassuming young man to meet. He claims greater efficiency in locating gas than oil. He would stop at times and foretell the action of the instrument, telling what it was going through and describde every action of the instrument in advance of its action. In one spot it would work fine while perhaps less than a hundred feet away it would refuse to work at all. It was tried under every conceivable circumstance to determine if there might be any trickeryin its operation. Mr. Getz would tell before the instrument showed any action that they were approaching oil, saying he could feel it in the machine and every time it would commence to work a few feet from the spot. Mr. Getz is postive that there is oil here.'"

FIRES IN IOWA FOR SIX MONTHS

State Fire Marshall J. A. Tracy reports that for the six months ending July 1, there were 3,075 fires in Ia. representing a loss of $3,779,882. During the same period last year there were 3,253 fires with a loss of 6, 161,284. Fire Marshall Tracy has set in motion various measures that have for their object the elimination of risks. He is a firm believer in the efficency of lightening rods. He says the use of lightning rods is almost an absolute protection against loss by lightening. He has gone into this method very thoroughly and the records show that in 1920 there were 157 lightning losses. In 143 cases there were no rods and the loss was $362.390.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE BEST IN WORLD

Efficient Machinery Makes Very Quick Work Possible—

WASHINGTON:—In the government printing office the United States has the best printing plant in the world. The goverrnment, thru its various departments and its printing establishment, gives to its people more useful information than does any other government in the world. A few private printing plants turn out more tons of printed paper a year but these run on a few big jobs. While they have a large amount of press work they do a far smaller amount of work in other respects.

It is a noteworthy fact that the principle single job of the government is done for the American farmer— the printing of 400,000 copies annually of the Agricultural Year Book, requiring 1,200,000 pounds of paper, 170,000,000 pounds of binder board, 50.000 yards of velium for cover. 580 spools of thread. The job that is most generally known to the public as the publication of the Congressional Record. The copy for this publication, running from 50 to 100 printed pages each day of the congressional session, is delivered to the printer at 7 o'clock in the evening and the records are placed in the mails about 6 o'clock the next morning. Along with these two larger jobs fairly familiar to the people of the country the government printing office conducts a vast amount of work of which the general public knows very little although it daily handles some of the output of the plant. For instance, this office prints an average of 4,200,000 postal cards per day and in the course of a year prints 160,000,000 money order forms.

In the typesetting department there are 88 linotype machines, 100 monotype keyboard machines, and 126 monotype casting machines. Fourteen tons of metal is used daily on casting machines. The number of forms sent to press in one year is about 171.000 or one a minute each eight-hour day.

In this printing establishment are machines which automatically gather the signatures for a book, stitch them, apply the glue, and preform most of the work of binding without individual handling of workmen. Machines automatic in operation, gather, stich cover and deliver pamphets of from 16 to 200 pages. As an illustration of the speed with which the gorevnment printing office can handle work, may be cited the record that was made in the publication of the report of the conference on the Limitation of Armaments. This document filled 910 printed pages, all set in the government printing office in 20 hours. The first form of 57 sixteen page signatures reached the press room at 10:30 a. m. and 1,500 complete copies were sent to the binder at 5:30 p. m. the same day. Paper bound copies were in the hands of the president at 9 o'clock the next morning or only 40 hours after the manuscript copy was received at the government printing office. Another record accompolished was the publication of the report on the sinking of the Maine. The report was transmitted to congress by President one afternoon and the next morning printed copies were in the hands of every member. It contained nearly 300 pages of printed matter and 24 full page illustrations.

The government printing office is today at its highest point of efficiency and economic printing under the supervision of George H. Carter, of Iowa, who began to learn his trade in a small country printing office, serving later in every capacity in newspaper work and also clerk of the joint committee on printing where he acquired the knowledge of government printing problems which enabled him to institute numerous improvements in management of the government printing office.

HARDING'S BODY IS LAID IN TOMB

Nation in Mourning as the Simple Funeral Services for the Dead President Are Held in Marion—Imposing Official Cortege and Ceremony in Washington.

Marion, O.—All that was mortal of Warren G. Harding, twenty-ninth President of the United States, was placed in the tomb Friday, August 10, in the Marion cemetery.

No imposing ceremony, no military display, no marching of organizations marked the mournful event, because Mrs. Harding wished it so, but as the simple services were being held in the cemetery, in every city, every town and village, every home of the broad land the people of America were paying tribute to the memory of their chief whose life truly was sacrificed in their behalf. Barter and trade, financial business and every other worldly activity that could be suspended ceased for the time, all sports and pastimes were abandoned—the nation mourned.

Great Throngs in Marion.

Here in Marion were gathered a host of prominent persons, from President Coolidge down and including the leading government officials, senators and representatives, governors of the states and delegations from hundreds of cities and organizations. All day Thursday and on Friday morning special trains brought in the throngs, and other thousands of Ohioans came by automobile. So great were the crowds that it was necessary for the state officials to arrange to have the roads for miles around Marion patrolled to prevent accidents.

Thursday morning the funeral train arrived from Washington, and Mr. Harding's body was taken at once to the residence of his father, Dr. George T. Harding. From 2 until 10 p. m. that day and from 9 a. m. until 1 p. m. Friday opportunity was given Ohioans to view the face of their dead friend. Then, quite without pomp, the casket was borne to the cemetery. Following the hearse were the members of the Harding family; next the President of the United States with members of the cabinet and other high officials; then came Mr. Harding's close friends and neighbors, and after them a great concourse of mourners.

Simple Services in Cemetery.

It was Mrs. Harding's wish that all who wished should have a place in the funeral procession. Among those who sadly accepted the invitation were all the employees of the Marion Star who had worked for Mr. Harding for years, and the Ohio newspaper publishers, members of the Associated Ohio Dailies, in which organization Mr. Harding had taken an active part.

Reaching the cemetery about three o'clock, the cortege proceeded to the receiving vault, and there the brief services were held. Prayers, readings from the Scriptures and the singing of Mr. Harding's favorite hymns—that was all. It was simple and dignified, as was befitting the obsequies of a distinguished citizen of Marion. The services were in charge of Rev. George M. Landis, pastor of Trinity Baptist church, of which Mr. Harding was a member. He was assisted by Rev. Jesse Swank, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, Mrs. Harding's pastor.

Troops Guard the Casket.

Instead of being interred in the family plot, the body of Mr. Harding was placed in the receiving vault, and there it will remain until a mausoleum has been erected to receive it. As the weeping family and friends moved away from the vault, National Guard soldiers stepped forward and took their place on guard. In a few days they will be replaced by the guard from the regular army, that will stand around the vault for the regulation period of six months. The detail for this purpose will consist of an officer and twenty-five men from Fort Hayes at Columbus.

The Presidential party from Washington, which came on a special train Friday morning, started back for the national capital almost immediately after the conclusion of the ceremonies.

Mrs. Harding, who had borne so well her difficult part, also returned to Washington, on the same train that brought her and her dead. It was announced that she would remain in the White House until she has finished the supervision and removal of the effects of the late President. This probably will take about three weeks.

Services at Capital.

Washington. — The United States government Wednesday paid official tribute to the body of Warren G. Harding, twenty-ninth president. It was a tribute at once simple, dignified and impressive. The ceremonies were preliminary to the journey to Marion, Ohio, and the final interment Friday in the late president's home city.

The ceremonies consisted in official transfer in the morning of the body from the White House to the Capitol, where it lay in state until six o'clock in the evening. The American people participated by marching in the funeral procession and by passing by the bier in the rotunda of the Capitol and by lining the funeral route in vast, reverent crowds. Ten thousand school children carpeted with flowers historic Pennsylvania avenue.

The body left the White House, where it had lain during the night, at 10 a. m. Gen. John J. Pershing, general of the United States army and commander of the military escort, led the procession to the Capitol.

Guard of Honor.

Six generals of the army and six admirals of the navy acted as an immediate guard of honor to the caisson bearing the remains of the late President.

Seven senators, including President pro tem. Cummins, and seven representatives, including Speaker Gillette of the house, acted with members of the Harding cabinet as honorary pallbearers.

Senator Lodge of Massachusetts, marshal of the civic procession, the clergymen in charge of the services, and the physicians who attended President Harding at his last illness were assigned to places immediately in advance of the caisson.

Chief Justice Taft participated as a former president instead of as head of the Supreme court. Ex-President and Mrs. Wilson were placed behind him.

Behind Mr. Wilson in the procession were placed, successively, ambassadors of foreign governments, associate justices of the Supreme court, foreign ministers and charge d'affaires, senators and officers of the senate, representatives and officers of the house, governors of states and territories and commissioners of the District of Columbia and acting secretaries of the various departments of the federal government.

The following also were included in the official section of the procession:

Circuit Court of Appeals, Court of Claims, Court of Customs Appeals, Court of Appeals and Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, undersecretaries and assistant secretaries of federal departments, assistant postmasters general and assistant attorneys general, United States marshal and United States attorney.

The chairman or senior member of the following groups:

Federal Reserve board, Interstate Commerce commission, Civil Service commission, various mixed commissions dealing with international problems and other agencies of the federal government.

Next in line came patriotic and civic organizations, headed by men who have won the Congressional Medal of Honor for heroic deeds in the service of their country by land or sea. They were followed by army officers, led by Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt.

Next came officers of the coast guard and public health service, headed by the assistant secretary of the treasury and officers of the coast and geodetic survey, under command of the assistant secretary of commerce.

The services in the rotunda of the Capitol were as follows:

Invocation, Dr. A. Freeman, assistant pastor of the Calvary Baptist church, of which Mr. Harding was a member.

Hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," male quartet of Calvary Baptist church.

Scripture: Twenty-third Psalm, Micah, sixth chapter, eighth verse.

Revelation, twenty-second chapter, first to fifth verses.

Quotations.

Prayer, Dr. James Shera Montgomery, chaplain of the house of representatives.

Hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," male quartet.

Benediction, Dr. Anderson.

The body then lay in state and from four to six the general public was admitted.

At 6 p. m. the casket was taken back to the car in which it had been brought across the continent. Then began the journey to Marion—back to the home town.

The special train bearing the President's body arrived in Washington at 10:25 p. m. Tuesday after a transcontinental journey of 96 hours and 10 minutes. It was 9 hours late—the great crowds in the big cities had almost blocked its way. President Coolidge, cabinet members, members of congress and civilian and military dignitaries were at the depot. The Marine band played "Nearer My God, to Thee."

Mrs. Harding walked to her car on the arm of Secretary Christian.

The casket, escorted by its guard of honor, was taken on a caisson to the White House, where it arrived at 11:30. It was placed in the East room.

At midnight the White House doors were closed, leaving Mrs. Harding with her dead.

AT REST IN BEAUTIFUL SPOT

President Harding's Grave, in the Family Plot, in Quiet Little Cemetery at Marion.

Marion, O., Aug.—The spot in Marion cemetery where all that is mortal of Warren G. Harding will rest, is one of the most beautiful in the vicinity of the quiet town to which he ofttimes said he hoped to return as an ordinary citizen," after his public services.

Situated at almost the center of the old burial ground, the Harding family plot, where a President of the United States will resume his place among the kindly folk he knew and loved as neighbors, lies cupped in a tiny valley. Two giant elms cast deep shadows over slabs of granite which mark the resting place of the President's mother and of his sister, and only a few steps away a gleaming gravel roadway winds through a perfect archway of foliage fashioned by the interlocking branches of elms.

Farmers: Patronize Yourself

There is sometimes a wide margin between the costs of the producer to that of the consumer. Stop to think of the grain produced by the farmer which is sold and finally comes back in little packages of breakfast foods at an increased cost of several hundred percent due to the various manufacturing costs.

Right here is where the farmer comes in when he owns, patronizes and helps operate a co-operative creamery. His raw product (cream) is manufactured into a finished product (butter) at a small cost. It brings a good price at home and on our eastern markets. (The profit stays at home.)

By selling your cream to us Mr. Farmer, you are patronizing yourself as a producer, manufacturer and consumer.

You will find it pays to stick to your local creamery which enables you to get the HIGHEST MARKET PRICE FOR YOUR CREAM. Just ask the farmer who has lived in a community where there was no creamery, and he will tell you to—

DISTRICT BUTTERMAKERS MEET HERE FOR SCORING

Lake Mills Wins District Score With Klemme A Close Second

Last Thursday the buttermakers of the Fifth District of the Iowa Buttermakers Association, comprising Hancock and Winnebago counties, held their regular scoring test at the Klemme Co-Op. Creamery on last Thursday afternoon. The meet here was well attended and only two buttermakers from the entire district were absent. The next meeting will be held at Britt next month.

Mr. Paul Christensen, of Little Falls, Minnesota, was here to judge the butter and place the scores. The Lake Mills Creamery took first with a score of 95. Klemme Creamery ran a close race and took the second highest score with 94½.

When it comes to judging that close it is a hard matter to decide. We sampled the prize winning butter and also the local product and we thought the Klemme butter had the best flavor, and we did not know whose butter we were eating either. But there was no question at all in the minds of the buttermakers that Christensen picked the two highest, although some thought Gimer's was the best butter.

The butter which was scored will also be scored at the North Iowa Fair by the State Scoring Association. The five highest men in a district will then be awarded a Silver Cup. Last year our district lost out by only .005 of 1 per cent. We hope they win this year and that the Klemme Creamery will be at the top of the list.

The buttermakers were shown a good time here and all seemed to enjoy themselves. The local gang set up the treats to the crowd.

No it wasn't buttermilk eiher—it was ice cream sundae.

DOGS, CATS, SPREAD FLEAS

To Prevent Outbreaks in Buildings Keep Pets Free of Pest

Does your dog have flees? If he has, an infestation in the home and in other buildings may be looked for. In order to prevent these outbreaks, dogs and cats can be placed on the "black list". Domestic and stray animals should be kept from entering buildings or sleeping under them, accordingto Carl J. Drake, head of the entomology department at Iowa State College, who reports that a number of flea outbreaks have occured this summer.

'Dogs may be freed of leas by washing them thoroly in a three per cent solution of creolin or other creosote compounds that mix readily with water,' Dr. Drake states. "In order to insure complete "kill" keep the dog in the bath not less than five or six minutes. Wash the head first to cut off the escape of many that will make for the ears if the washing is started on the other parts of the body."

According to Mr. Drake when fleas infest lawns or yards they can be killed with a nicotine sulfate spray made by dissolving a pound of laundry soap in four gallons of water and then adding one ounce of nicotine sulfate. Be sure that a thorough application of the spray is made to all parts of the lawn or yard in fested.

An' I'll bet you a million pesos thet if you got goin' onct, an' she seen you as I've seen you—wal, I know what she'd think of you. This old world 'ain't changed much. Some women may be white-skinned an' soft-eyed an' sweet-voiced an' high-souled, but they all like to see a man! Gene, here's your game. Let Don Carlos come along. Be civil. If he an' his gang are hungry, feed 'em. Take even a little overbearin' Greaser talk. Be blind if he wants his gang to steal somethin'. Let him think the women hev mosied down to the ranch. But if he says you're lyin'—if he as much as looks round to see the women—jest jump him same as you jumped Pat Hawe. Me an' Monty'll hang back fer thet, an' if your strong bluff don't go through, if the Don's gang even thinks of flashin' guns, then we'll open up. An' all I got to say is if them Greasers stand for real gun-play they'll be sure fust I ever seen."

"Nels, there are white men in that gang," said Stewart.

"Shore. But me an' Monty'll be thinkin' of thet. If they start anythin' it'll hev to be shore quick."

"All right, Nels, old friend, and thanks," replied Stewart.

Nels returned to the campfire, and Stewart resumed his silent guard.

Madeline's guests sat talking in low voices until a late hour. The incident now began to take on the nature of Helen's long-yearned-for adventure. Some of the party even grew merry in a subdued way. Then, gradually, one by one they tired and went to bed.

To keep from thinking of Stewart and the burning anger he had caused her to feel for herself, Madeline tried to keep her mind on other things. But thought of him recurred, and each time there was a hot commotion in her breast hard to stifle. Intelligent reasoning seemed out of her power. In the daylight it had been possible for her to be oblivious to Stewart's deceit after the moment of its realization. At night, however, in the strange silence and hovering shadows of gloom, with the speaking stars seeming to call to her, with the moan of the wind in the pines, and the melancholy mourn of coyotes in the distance, she was not able to govern her thought and emotion. She had inadvertently heard Nels' conversation with Stewart; she had listened, hoping to hear some good news or to hear the worst; she had learned both, and, moreover, enlightenment on one point of Stewart's complex motives. He wished to spare her any sight that might offend, frighten, or disgust her. Yet this Stewart, who showed a fineness of feeling that might have been wanting even in Boyd Harvey, maintained a secret rendezvous with that pretty, abandoned Bonita. Here always the hot shame, like a live, stinging, internal fire, abruptly ended Madeline's thought. The hours wore on, and at length, as the stars began to pale and there was no sound whatever, she fell asleep.

She was called out of her slumber. Day had broken bright and cool. The sun was still below the eastern crags. Ambrose, with several other cowboys, had brought up buckets of spring water, and hot coffee and cakes. Madeline's party appeared to be none the worse for the night's experience. Indeed, the meager breakfast might have been as merrily partaken of as it was hungrily had not Ambrose enjoined silence.

"They're expecting company down below," he said.

This information and the summary manner in which the cowboys soon led the party higher up among the ruined shelves of rock caused a recurrence of anxiety. Madeline insisted on not going beyond a projection of cliff from which she could see directly down into the camp.

"I Promise Not to Make Any Noise," Replied Madeline.

"Ambrose, do you really think the guerrillas will come?" she asked.

"Sure. We know. Nels just rode in and said they were on their way up. Miss Hammond, can I trust you? You won't let out a squeal if there's a fight down there? Stewart told me to hide you out of sight or keep you from lookin'?"

"I promise not to make any noise," replied Madeline.

Madeline arranged her coat so that she could lie upon it, and settled down to wait developments. There came a slight rattling of stones in the rear. She turned to see Helen sliding down a bank with a perplexed and troubled cowboy. Ambrose sternly and heroically prepared to carry her back to the others. He laid hold of her. In a fury, with eyes blazing, Helen whispered:

"Let go of me! Majesty, what does this fool mean?"

Madeline laughed. She knew Helen, and had marked the whisper, when ordinarily Helen would have spoken imperiously, and not low. Madeline explained to her the exigency of the situation. "I might run, but I'll never scream," said Helen. With that Ambrose had to be content to let her stay. However, he found her a place somewhat farther back from Madeline's position, where he said there was less danger of her being seen. Then he sternly bound her to silence, tarried a moment to comfort Christine, his wife, acting as maid to the ladies, and returned to where Madeline lay concealed. He had been there scarcely a moment when he whispered:

"I hear hosses. The guerrillas are comin'."

Madeline's hiding place was well protected from possible discovery from below. She could peep over a kind of parapet, through an opening in the tips of the pines that reached up to the cliff, and obtain a commanding view of the camp circle and its immediate surroundings. She could not, however, see far either to right or left of the camp, owing to the obstructing foliage. Presently the sound of horses' hoofs quickened the beat of her pulse and caused her to turn keener gaze upon the cowboys below.

Although she had some inkling of the course Stewart and his men were to pursue, she was not by any means prepared for the indifference she saw. Frank was asleep, or pretended to be. Three cowboys were lazily and unconcernedly attending to campfire duties, such as baking biscuits, watching the ovens, and washing tins and pots. The elaborate set of aluminum plates, cups, etc., together with the other camp fixtures that had done service for Madeline's party, had disappeared. Nick Steele sat with his back to a log, smoking his pipe. Another cowboy had just brought the horses closer into camp, where they stood waiting to be saddled. Nels appeared to be fussing over a pack. Stewart was rolling a cigarette. Monty had apparently nothing to do for the present except whistle, which he was doing much more loudly than melodiously. The whole ensemble gave an impression of careless indifference.

The sound of horses' hoofs grew louder and slowed its beat. One of the cowboys pointed down the trail, toward which several of his comrades turned their head for a moment, then went on with their occupations.

Presently a shaggy, dusty horse bearing a lean, ragged, dark rider rode into the camp and halted. Another followed, and another. Horses with Mexican riders came in single file and stopped behind the leader.

"Buenos dias, senor," ceremoniously said the foremost guerrilla.

By straining her ears Madeline heard that voice, and she recognized it as belonging to Don Carlos. Stewart answered the greeting in Spanish, and, waving his hand toward the campfire, added in English, "Get down and eat."

The guerrillas were anything but slow in complying. They crowded to the fire, then spread in a little circle and squatted upon the ground, laying their weapons beside them. The cowboys were not cordial in their reception of this visit, but they were hospitable. The law of the desert had always been to give food and drink to wayfaring men, whether lost or hunted or hunting.

"They appear to be friendly enough," whispered Madeline. "Ambrose, tell me—explain to me—the real thing."

"Sure. Gene thinks they're after you ladies—to carry you off. But Gene— Oh, Gene's some highfalutin in his ideas lately. Most of us boys think the guerrillas are out to rob—that's all."

Whatever might have been the secret motive of Don Carlos and his men, they did not allow it to interfere with a hearty appreciation of a generous amount of food. Then, as each and every one began to roll and smoke the inevitable cigarette of the Mexican, there was a subtle change in manner. They smoked and looked about the camp, off into the woods, up at the crags, and back at the leisurely cowboys. They had the air of men waiting for something.

"Senor," began Don Carlos, addressing Stewart. As he spoke he swept his sombrero to indicate the camp circle.

Madeline could not distinguish his words, but his gesture plainly indicated a question in regard to the rest of the camping party. Stewart's reply and the wave of his hand down the trail meant that his party had gone home. Stewart turned to some task, and the guerrilla leader quietly smoked. He looked cunning and thoughtful. Presently a big-boned man with a bullet head and a blistered red face of evil coarseness got up and threw away his cigarette. He was an American.

"Hey, cull," he called in loud voice, "ain't ye goin' to cough up a drink?"

"My boys don't carry liquor on the trail," replied Stewart.

"Haw, haw! I heerd over in Rodeo thet ye was gittin' to be shore some fer temperance," said this fellow. "I hate to drink water, but I guess I've gotter do it."

He went to the spring, sprawled down to drink, and all of a sudden he thrust his arm down in the water to bring forth a basket. The cowboys in the hurry of packing had neglected to remove this basket; and it contained bottles of wine and liquors for Madeline's guests. They had been submerged in the spring to keep them cold. The guerrilla fumbled with the lid, opened it, and then got up, uttering a loud roar of delight.

Stewart made an almost imperceptible motion as if to leap forward; but he checked the impulse. "Guess my party forgot that. You're welcome to it."

Like bees the guerrillas swarmed around the lucky finder of the bottles. The drink did not last long, and it served only to liberate the spirit of recklessness. The several white outlaws began to prowl around the camp; some of the Mexicans did likewise; others waited, showing by their ill-concealed expectancy the nature of their thoughts.

It was the demeanor of Stewart and his comrades that puzzled Madeline. Apparently they felt no anxiety or even particular interest. Don Carlos, who had been covertly watching them, now made his scrutiny open, even aggressive. The guerrilla leader seemed undecided, but not in any sense puzzled.

In her growing excitement Madeline had not clearly heard Ambrose's low whispers and she made an effort to distract some of her attention from those below to the cowboy crouching beside her.

The quality, the note of Ambrose's whisper had changed. It had a slight sibilant sound.

"Don't be mad if sudden-like I clap my hands over your eyes, Miss Hammond," he was saying. "Somethin's brewin' below. I never seen Gene so cool. That's a dangerous sign in him. And look, see how the boys are workin' together! Oh, it's slow and accident-like, but I know it's sure not accident. That foxy Greaser knows, too. But maybe his men don't. If they are wise they haven't sense enough to care. The Don, though—he's worried. It's Nels and Monty he's watchin'. And well he need do it! There, Nick and Frank have settled down on that log with Booly. They don't seem to be packin' guns. But look how heavy their vests hang. A gun in each side! Those boys can pull a gun and flop over that log quicker than you can think. Do you notice how Nels and Monty and Gene are square between them guerrillas and the trail up here? It doesn't seem on purpose, but it is. Look at Nels and Monty. How quiet they are confabbin' together, paying no attention to the guerrillas. I see Monty look at Gene, then I see Nels look at Gene. Well, it's up to Gene. And they're goin' to back him. I reckon, Miss Hammond, there'd be dead Greasers round that camp long ago if Nels and Monty were foot-loose. They're beholdin' to Gene. That's plain. And, Lord! how it tickles me to watch them! Both packin' two forty-fives, butts swingin' clear. There's twenty-four shots in them four guns. And there's twenty-three guerrillas. If Nels and Monty ever throw guns at that close range, why, before you'd know what was up there'd be a pile of Greasers. There! Stewart said something to the Don. I wonder what. I'll gamble it was something to get the Don's outfit all close together. Sure! Greasers have no sense. But them white guerrillas. What they're lookin' some dubious. Whatever's comin' off will come soon, you can bet. I wish I was down there. But maybe it won't come to a scrap. Stewart's set on avoidin' that. He's a wonderful chap to get his way. Lord, though, I'd like to see him go after that overbearin' Greaser! See! the Don can't stand prosperity. All this strange behavior of cowboys is beyond his pulque-soaked brains. Then he's a Greaser. If Gene doesn't knock him on the head presently he'll begin to get over his scare, even of Nels and Monty. But Gene 'll pick out the right time. Never saw Nels in but one fight, then he just shot a Greaser's arm off for tryin' to draw on him. But I've heard all about him. And Monty! Monty's the real old-fashioned gunman. What I don't understand is how Monty keeps so quiet and easy and peaceful-like. That's not his way, with such an outfit lookin' for trouble. O-ha! Now for the grand bluff. Looks like no fight at all!"

The guerrilla leader had ceased his restless steps and glances, and turned to Stewart with something of bold resolution in his aspect.

"Gracias, senor," he said. "Adios." He swept his sombrero in the direction of the trail leading down the mountain to the ranch; and as he completed the gesture a smile, crafty and jeering, crossed his swarthy face.

Ambrose whispered so low that Madeline scarcely heard him. "If the Greaser goes that way he'll find our horses and get wise to the trick. Oh, he's wise now! But I'll gamble he never even starts on that trail."

Neither hurriedly nor guardedly Stewart rose out of his leaning posture and took a couple of long strides toward Don Carlos.

"Go back the way you came," he fairly yelled; and his voice had the ring of a bugle.

Ambrose nudged Madeline; his whisper was tense and rapid: "Don't miss nothin'. Gene's called him. Whatever's comin' off will be here quick as lightnin'. See! I guess maybe that Greaser don't savvy good U. S. lingo. Look at that dirty yaller face turn green. Put one eye on Nels and Monty! That's great—just to see 'em. Just as quiet and easy. But oh, the difference! Bent and stiff—that means every muscle is like a rawhide riata. They're watchin' with eyes that can see the workin's of them Greasers' minds. Now there ain't a hoss-hair between them Greasers and h—l!"

Don Carlos gave Stewart one long malignant stare; then he threw back his head, swept up the sombrero, and his evil smile showed gleaming teeth.

"Senor—" he began.

With magnificent bound Stewart was upon him. The guerrilla's cry was throttled in his throat. A fierce wrestling ensued, too swift to see clearly; then heavy, sodden blows, and Don Carlos was beaten to the ground. Stewart leaped back. Then, crouching with his hands on the butts of guns at his hips, he yelled, he thundered at the guerrillas. He had been quicker than a panther, and now his voice was so terrible that it curdled Madeline's blood, and the menace of deadly violence in his crouching position made her shut her eyes. But she had to open them. In that single instant Nels and Monty had leaped to Stewart's side. Both were bent down, with hands on the butts of guns at their hips. Nels' piercing yell seemed to divide Monty's roar of rage. Then they ceased, and echoes clapped from the crags. The silence of those three men crouching like tigers about to leap was more menacing than the nerve-racking yells.

Then the guerrillas wavered and broke and ran for their horses. Don Carlos rolled over, rose, and staggered away, to be helped upon his mount. He looked back, his pale and bloody face that of a thwarted demon. The whole band got into action and were gone in a moment.

"I knew it," declared Ambrose. "Never seen a Greaser who could face gun-play. That was some warm. And Monty Price never flashed a gun! He'll never get over that. I reckon, Miss Hammond, we're some lucky to avoid trouble. Gene had his way, as you seen. We'll be makin' tracks for the ranch in about two shakes."

"Why?" whispered Madeline, breathlessly. She became conscious that she was weak and shaken.

"Because the guerrillas sure will get their nerve back, and come sneakin' on our trail or try to head us off by ambushin'," replied Ambrose. "That's their way. Otherwise three cowboys couldn't bluff a whole gang like that. Gene knows the nature of Greasers. They're white-livered. But I reckon we're in more danger now than before, unless we get a good start down the mountain. There! Gene's callin'. Come! Hurry!"

Helen had slipped down from her vantage point, and therefore had not seen the last act in that little campfire drama. It seemed, however, that her desire for excitement was satisfied, for her face was pale and she trembled when she asked if the guerrillas were gone.

Ambrose hurried the three women over the rough rocks, down the cliff. The cowboys below were saddling horses in haste. Swiftly, with regard only for life and limb, Madeline, Helen, and Christine were lowered by lassoes and half carried down to the level. By the time they were safely down the other members of the party appeared on the cliff above. They were in excellent spirits, appearing to treat the matter as a huge joke.

Ambrose put Christine on a horse and rode away through the pines; Frankie Slade did likewise with Helen. Stewart led Madeline's horse up to her, helped her to mount, and spoke one stern word, "Wait!" Then as fast as one of the women reached the level she was put upon a horse and taken away by a cowboy escort. Few words were spoken. Haste seemed to be the great essential. The horses were urged, and, once in the trail, spurred and led into a swift trot. One cowboy drove up four pack-horses, and these were hurriedly loaded with the party's baggage. Castleton and his companions mounted, and galloped off to catch the others in the lead. This left Madeline behind with Stewart and Nels and Monty.

"They're goin' to switch off at the holler thet heads near the trail a few miles down," Nels was saying, as he tightened his saddle-girth. "Thet holler heads into a big canyon. Once in thet, it'll be every man fer hisself. I reckon there won't be anythin' wuss than a rough ride."

Nels smiled reassuringly at Madeline, but he did not speak to her. Monty took her canteen and filled it at the spring and hung it over the pommel of her saddle. He put a couple of biscuits in the saddle-bag.

"Don't fergit to take a drink an' a bite as you're ridin' along," he said. "An' don't worry, Miss Majesty. Stewart 'll be with you, an' me an' Nels hangin' on the back trail."

His somber and sullen face did not change in its strange intensity, but the look in his eyes Madeline felt she would never forget. Left alone with these three men, now stripped of all pretense, she realized how fortune had favored her and what peril still hung in the balance. Stewart swung astride his big black, spurred him, and whistled. At the whistle Majesty jumped, and with swift canter followed Stewart. Madeline looked back to see Nels already up and Monty handing him a rifle. Then the pines hid her view.

Once in the trail, Stewart's horse broke into a gallop. Majesty changed his gait and kept at the black's heels. Stewart called back a warning. The low, wide-spreading branches of trees might brush Madeline out of the saddle. Fast riding through the forest along a crooked, obstructed trail called forth all her alertness.

Before long Stewart wheeled at right angles off the trail and entered a hollow between two low bluffs. Madeline saw tracks in the open patches of ground. Here Stewart's horse took to a brisk walk.

At last Madeline was brought to a dead halt by Stewart and his horse blocking the trail. Looking up, she saw they were at the head of a canyon that yawned beneath and widened its gray-walled, green-patched slopes down to a black forest of fir. Retracting her gaze, Madeline saw packhorses cross an open space a mile below, and she thought she saw the stag hounds. Stewart's dark eyes searched the slopes high up along the craggy escarpments. Then he put the black to the descent.

He led off to the right, zigzagging an intricate course through the roughest ground Madeline had ever ridden over. He crashed through cedars, threaded a tortuous way among boulders, made his horse slide down slanting banks of soft earth, picked a slow and cautious progress across weathered slopes of loose rock. Madeline followed, finding in this ride a tax on strength and judgment. It was dust and heat, a parching throat, that caused her to think of time; and she was amazed to see the sun sloping to the west. Stewart never stopped; he never looked back; he never spoke.

"After a mile or so of easy travel the ground again began to fall decidedly, sloping in numerous ridges, with draws between. Soon night shadowed the deeper gullies. Madeline was refreshed by the cooling of the air.

Stewart traveled slowly now. The barks of coyotes seemed to startle him. Often he stopped to listen. And during one of those intervals the silence was broken by sharp rifle shots. Madeline could not tell whether they were near or far, to right or left, behind or before. Evidently Stewart was both alarmed and baffled. He dismounted. He went cautiously forward to listen. Madeline fancied she heard a cry, low and far away. It was only that of a coyote, she convinced herself, yet it was so wailing, so human, that she shuddered. Stewart came back. He slipped the bridle of both horses, and he led them. Every few paces he stopped to listen. He changed his direction several times, and the last time he got among rough, rocky ridges. The iron shoes of the horses cracked on the rocks. That sound must have penetrated far into the forest. It perturbed Stewart, for he searched for softer ground. Meanwhile the shadows merged into darkness. The stars shone. The wind rose. Madeline believed hours passed.

AT WORK ON BIG CONVENTION

Lieut. Gen. Hunter Liggett, in Charge of Arrangements, Being Assisted by Many Others.

With a powerful former lieuteranat general, who commanded the first army of a million fighting men in France, at the helm, and important committees headed by ex-officers and "buck privates" alike, preparations for the American Legion's fifth annual convention, to be held in San Francisco next October, are progressing.

Gen. Hunter Liggett, a favorite among Legionnaires because of his efforts to build up the Legion in San Francisco, finds the important task of directing arrangements for the big national gathering a pleasant, though busy and comprehensive job.

Not all of the work of preparing for the convention is being handled by Legionnaires. San Francisco has made a systematic study of conventions and the result has been the development of an efficient corps of prominent business men, who, originally "hobbying it" as convention workers, got into the hang of the activity so well that they find themselves called into conference every time a major conclave comes to the city. Many of these distinguished citizens, staid business men, whose "bit" during the war may have been the selling of millions of dollars in Liberty bonds and thousands of other splendid deeds, are today "drafted" into the committees preparing for the national convention. Their ability to handle efficiently and well the "short cuts" that have been ferreted out through the staging of more than one hundred conventions each year, will serve the Legion convention workers most effectively. Their part is certain to add to the already tentative program that is now in the making.

LIEUT. GEN. HUNTER LIGGETT

San Francisco expects 150,000 visitors to attend the convention.

NAVY IS TO BE REPRESENTED

Numerous War Vessels and Men to Represent Department to Attend Legion Convention.

Nine battleships, 38 destroyers and numerous auxiliary vessels will participate in the naval show in conjunction with the national convention of the American Legion in San Francisco October 15 to 19. The personnel attached to the ships will number 900 commissioned officers, 100 warrant officers and 16,000 enlisted men.

Authorization of the battle fleet's presence was granted by Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., assistant secretary of the navy. The ships will anchor off San Francisco October 12 and will remain until October 28. Included in the fleet will be the battleships California, Maryland, New York, Texas, Arizona, Pennsylvania, New Mexico, Idaho and Tennessee.

Legion convention officials are endeavoring to emphasize the naval program of the gathering to a greater extent than has been attempted in previous years. To that end, the naval authorities of a number of countries allied with the United States in the World war have been asked to send vessels.

VETERANS TO PEOPLE TRACT

American Legion Indorses Washington Land Settlement Project for Former Warriors.

Indorsement by the American Legion of a land settlement project of the state of Washington has made it possible that the tract may be completely peopled by veterans of United States wars.

This, the Whiee Bluffs-Hanford land settlement project, was considered for opening in the spring of 1922, and sufficient applications were received at that time to settle the tracts with veterans as homesteaders, but preliminary work delayed the opening and only a few were granted land. The legislature in 1923 increased the appropriation for the settlement project and made available 100 tracts for veterans who, under the state law, are given preference in settlement. Further aid was extended to the aspiring agriculturists by provisions for loans from the state with which to stock the farms.

Complete colonization by veterans of the tract is the hope of Legion men, who offer every co-operation to the war fighter who seeks to take advantage of the opportunity for homesteading.

The Greimann Motor Company received another shipment of seven Fords last Thursday. The week before they received fourteen. They have sold sixty-two cars this season so far.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Johnson, of Garner. were business callers here Monday. Mr. Johnson was formerly in the clothing business there in the Gildner Bros. & Johnson firm.

A 7½ pound baby girl was born to Mr. and Mrs. Charles Papousek of Belmond Saturday evening. This makes our townsman, Ed. Jacobs, strut about with a dignified stride as he is now "Uncle Ed."

Mr. and Mrs. Elko Buss were at Garner Saturday. We can always spot Elko as his car carries license number 13.

Mrs. E. G. Ell and son Milvern, and daughter, Arlene, came Saturday in their car for a week's visit with relatives and friends in this vicinity.

W. J. Hampel and family left early in their car Friday morning for Minnesota. They intend to pitch camp at some nice lake and later will drive on to South Dakota for a visit.

Gasoline is surely coming down in Iowa. Saturday at Mason City it was selling at 20c a gallon. Sunday it was cut to 18 cents. Looks like a gas war is on, but we should worry. It is rumored it will go as low as 12 cents.

Mrs. Darner, of Minneapolis, is here for a month's visit with her daughter, Mrs. J. L. Hesselhuus. Dr. and Mrs. Hesselhuus drove up to Albert Lea Sunday to meet her.

Harl Gimer had his tonsils removed at Mason City last Thursday and therefore had the usual sore neck for a few days. But we have often thought it would be a heck of a note if a giraffe ever got a sore neck now wouldn't it Harl?

Hattie Lanahan and daughter, Laura; and Dewey Rice and family, left last week in Fred Musfelts car for Louisburg, Kansas, for a visit with Dewey's relatives and old friends.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Fouts and family from Riceville, Iowa, came Saturday for a visit at the A. D. Gimer home. They returned home Monday. Harl Gimer went to Riceville with them for a weeks visit.

The baseball tournament at Garner this year paid out, so we were told by a Garner business man. This has been a losing proposition with them for the last three years. They usually had too much rain to suit them.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Waterman and daughter, Mable; and Mr. and Mrs. C G Waterman and baby expect to leave today for Springfield and San born, Minnesota, for a visit with relatives. They will also spend some time at the various lakes.

A very appropriate memorial service was held at the First Methodist Church last Friday afternoon. The stores were all closed for one hour during the funeral services of the late President Harding. The service was well attended.

VOLUME 1. Thursday, August 16, 1923 NUMBE

One of our customers came in the other day, and in conversation said that his crop turned out good, and then he said it was the new disk that worked the seed bed well, the new seeder that scattered the seed even, and the new binder that cut it without trouble—those are the things that make a good crop. Now of course it made us feel good to have him tell us that the machinery we sold him is what helped make his crop a good one, but, did you ever stop and take another notice—the farmer with up-to-date machinery is the farmer who is progressing, the one who gets the crop and makes the money.

SCHOOL WILL OPEN SEPTEMBER THIRD HERE

TEACHERS HAVE ALL BEEN HIR ED BY BOARD

Will Have Seven Teachers This Year Instead of Only Four

Our new school building is rapidly nearing completion and will be ready by September 3rd, and which date the teachers and children will commence another school year's

The new building gives us four

Miss Gladys Bucham of Spencer, Iowa, will teach the 1-2 and 3rd grades; Miss Bertha Flessner the4-5 and 6th grades; and Miss Geneva [illegible], of Northwood, Iowa will have charge of the seventh and eighth.

These grade teachers will have their hands full, but they come to us well trained, and their reccommendations indicate that they are a live bunch of workers, and the Board is pleased that they ha[illegible] able to secure them.

And say, Parents find out which one of these teachers is teaching your child, look her up and "grab a hand" and get acquainted. These things all help to make a good school.

If our school population keeps on increasing it will most likely be necessary to add another grade teacher next year.

For the high school, our new building provides one large assembly room, 30x60, three large recitation rooms, 18x28, Domestic Science Room, 24x30 and Manual training room, 20 x 30.

We have four teachers for the High school. We are very luckly to have Superintendent Neese with us for the coming year; the board has great confidence in his ability as an organizer and systemizer.

Mr. Earl Frigilgus is on the High School Staff too, he will teach mathametics, be athletic director for the boys and lead the orchestra.

Miss Ester Stacy of Osage, Iowa is Principle of the High School. and Miss Edna Scharlach of Corwith,Ia. will show the girls "how" in Domestic Science.

These ladies are "winners" which makes our staff of High School teachers an "all star team" and this together with the new building and the co-operation of the parents and townspeople will put our Klemme Schools in a class where they can't be beat.

Oh, yes, the gymsnasium, size 30 by 52, and the large stage opening off, will become a place where every one will love to come, to entertainments and games and see what "Our Kids" can do—Some schools have their gymnasium in the basement with poor ventilation, but not so with us. Our "gym" is on the ground floor with plenty of light and ventilation.

Then we must not forget to mention, new drinking fountains on each floor, fire hose on each floor, and the best fire escape that money can buy.—There are Shower Baths in both the Toilet rooms.

Another thing that we must brag about is our good janitor. Mr. Fred Jahnke has been with us two years, and by keeping the building comfortable and scruplously clean, he has done wonders in keeping up the health of our school children, you have probably noticed that our schools have scarcely been closed for contageous disease since this faithful man has been serving us. Lets' hope that Mr. Jahnke will live forever.

We have room to accomodate tuition pupils from rural districts and can make room for a dozen more in our high school.

We invite tuition pupils to come to Klemme for these reasons.

1st. We have good teachers. It is said that the teacher is nine tenths of the school, the Klemme Board recognizes this fact and takes pains to get the best.

2nd Our new convenient Building makes it easy for the children to do their school work.

3rd. Klemme is a clean town morally, when towns are smaller than Klemme the bad people are hard to handle and when towns are larger than Klemme, they don't seem to care what goes on—but here in Klemme we are the ideal size, where the citizens know what mischief is going on and tend to it at once.

Thats why we say to our rural friends—"Send your children to our Klemme Scholls and we will do our best, as a community and as a school to make good men and women out of your boys and girls.

Canada Thistle Eradication Demmonstrations.

Mr. R. H. Porter of the Extension Service will be in Hancock County, August 20 to 21st to conduct a demonstraton on the method of eradication of the Canada Thistle.

CLEAN OIL IS ESSENTIAL

It Means More Tractor Service; Keep Cans Closed.

"Clean oil is essential for best results in farm tractor lubrication," says E. V. Collins, of the agricultural engineering department of Iowa State College, in discussingg the use of tractors. "This is impossible," he continues, "unless some precautions are taken to keep the supply cans and funnels clean and free formdust

"It is not good practice," he says, "to carry oil in an open can as in this way collects on th surface," According to Mr. Collins, it is advisable to wipe funnel and filler opening in the crank case before pouring the oil in.

The purpose of lubrication is to prevent wearing surfaces from coming to actual contact under the working presure and temperature . A film of oil between the wearing part accompolishes this. If the oil is too thick, power will be wasted in overcoming the friction of the oil itself. Also, Professor Collins says, the oil may not feed into the bearing properly.

Since a new bearing, tho carefully fitted,is rough, as compared with one that has been in use for sor some time, new machinery should be worked in by degrees. By giving close attention to lubrication, and avoiding excessive speeds and overloads there will be no serious trouble.

NO MORE SUNDAY DANCES AT BAYSIDE

It will be gratifying news to many Clear Lake people that the Sunday dances at Bayside have been discontinued.

These Sunday dances have been a bone of contention for two years or more. Three local churches passed resolution unanimouly and petitions were signed by about 250 local citizens asking that Sunday dances and gamboling be stopped at Bayside Other organizations also entered complaints, and as a result the county attorney served notice that these dances must be stopped, and the Park Co. has agreed to comply with the request: The company will try roller skates as a substitute.

The Sunday dance is one of, if not the worst evil, in the breaking of the Sabbath code. Its influence is demoralizing and a menace to good morals and a clean life.

The Park Co. now plannig on having their dances begin at 12 o'clock midnight, and continue until 3 o'clock. But our prediction is this will be a dismal failure.— Clear Lake Reporter.

BOSS GOES ON HIS VACATION

TRY PLANTING TREES IN FALL

Elm and Maple Adapted, Says Ames Landscape Architect.

Trees and shrubs that drop their leaves early, such as the elm and maple, the lilac, viburnum in many varieties, including Wahoo, arrowwood, high and bush cranberry, and the mock orange, can be planted during the latter part of October and up to November 15, according to E. A. Piester, associate professor of landscape archetecture at Iowa State College.

"A great many people." says Mr. Peister, "do not realize that they an do much planting during the fall months, especially in the southern half of the state. Care should be taken, however, to encourage root growthby thorough watering each week if the weather is dry. All plants should have a three inch mulch of straw, old hay, leaves or stble mnure to provide protection during th first of the winter."

Avoid planting privet, dogwood(willows, populars and other late foli aged plants.

x Save Crank Case Oil

"When the auto crank case is drained, the oil should be saved for use in lubricating other farm machinery," says Prof. E. M. Mervine, of the agricultural engineering department of Iowo State College. "Of course," adds Professor Mervine, "this oil should not be used in the cream separator or in the magneto on the farm tractor."

The Old School Bell a Relic Of Early Days

WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH THE OLD SCHOOL BELL

Why Not Save It As A Historic Relic?

In behalf of the old school bell, the cheerful call of which has summoned so many of us to our daily tasks in prusuit of knowledge, and whose summons has been answered by so many whose feet will never more tread the familiar paths of Klemme, but whose beloved memory comes back to us with the ringing of the old bell—in view of these things I am moved to make this appeal to you

The history of this bell has been printed recently in these columns of school life. Whether all the history would pass muster under the critical judgement of a writer of state records matters not.

Sufice it to say that this particular bell has helped to make Klemme's history for a matter of practically 23 years, who cares much about what it did before that?

The question of the moment is: "What shall be done with the old bell to preserve this memorial piece of our town history"?

We have altogether too little to remind us of our original town history.

The one real historic memorial in our town is the old part of the revised construction of the school building in our city, commemorating the historic deeds of the early setlers of our town, and yet, with all that this signifies, I find every year most of us pass it by unheeded, and when we inspect the remain of its material form resting on a heap of earth in the rear o the school ground reserects a memory of school days and patriotic citizenship which it has imparted to us all.

If only the old bell could talk what a story it would tell us of the mutitudes of citizens it has called to school! Remember, however, that none of our boys and girls ever went astray, if they were honestly answering the call of the school bell.

Our forefathers in 1636 started Harvard college that learning might grow in this new land, i n1776 the descendents of these people rose and demanded freedom—in enlightened freedom.

That freedom was won and has been perpetrated only because of the developed intellectual capacity of the nation.

If you doubt this, look for one moment at the history of Spain, whose decadence from the most powerful nation on earth to her present negtigible standing is directly traceable to ignorance, to the fact that even today, practically 75% of her people can neither read nor write.

The emblem of our freedom, which we revere next to our flag, is the Liberty Bell—cracked and toneless,, tho it may be, we worship it.

The Liberty bell has only meant something to us because we have perpetrated the institutions of free government which it heraded.

That same free government and democracy is dependent entirely upon the education of the masses. Therefore I maintain that every school bell is a lineal desendent of the Liberty bell—and as such it is our patriotic duty to preserve this one and to. co-operate with the Board in an effort to make a permanent home for this old member of Klemme's relics.

Shall we junk the old bell or shall we stil keep it and continue using it to call chidren of future to the same Alma Mater of their forefathers?

Let us hear from you.

Yours very truly,
Levi Neese.

PLAN TO ATTEND THE HANCOCK COUNTY FAIR

SCHAEFER—MILLER

Another wedding occured when Miss Rose Schaeffer of Petersburg, Nebraska and Mr. Frank Miller of this city were united in marriage at 9:00 o'clock, Wednesday morning, at the home of the Bride at Petersburg, Neb.

Mr. Miller is well known around Klemme and recognized every where as a fine young man. We believe that Miss Schaeffer has picked an excellent mate to guide her through life's struggles.

We know very little of Miss Schaeffer's qualities, but we feel sure that she must be a most excellent young lady.

The couple will make their home for the present at the home of Mr. Miller's father.

The Times staff extends their congratulations to the happy couple.

Those who attended the wedding from Klemme were Mrs. John Miller, Bertha Miller, Mrs. G. P. McCullough, John Woods, wife and daughter.

FALL PIGS NEED GOOD CARE

Many Factors Involved; Proper Rations, Breeding Stock, Important

The methods used, the kind of breeding stock selected, the kind and nature of housing, the tpye of sanitation practiced, the range allowed, the markets sought and the quanity and quality of rations provided are all of vitl importnce in raising fall pigs succesfully. "The Iowa Experiment Station has invariably had good results when the above essentials of production have been carefully carried on," says C. C. Culberson, in active charge of the work there.

Mr. Culberson has found that it is well to have the pigs come in the latter part of August as the hot weather and flies are avoided to some extent and the pigs will be big enough to go thru the cold weather in good condition. "A good ration, properly supplemented, is a necessiy for the fall pig inasmuch as he does not have the pastures such as alfalfa, clover or rape, to mke up for the shortcomings of the ration," he says.

This means, according to Mr. Culbertson, a good ration during the suckling period as well as a good ration from weaning time to market weight. A ration that has given good results during the period is yellow corn, either shelled or on the ear, self-fed, plus 50 percent protein meat meal tankage self fed, all on pasture.

"Since the pasture is gone about weaning time it is usually good practice to add a small amount of alfalfa either as hay or as alalfa meal," says Mr. Cubertson. "Some like to mix about 10 parts of alalfa with 90 of tankage, by weight, and self feed it instead of straight tankage. This addition assures that the soluble vitamin content should be all right.

A good mineral mixture may be madeup as follows; 20 parts om common salt, 40 parts of finely ground raw bone meal or spent bone black, and 40 parts of wood ashes or finely ground oyster shell(all by weight). To each 100 pounds of this mixture add about one half ounce of potassium iodide.

LIVING IN GERMANY

A recent German official bulletin announces that from July 1, to December 31, 1922, the budget of a Berlin workman's family was 283,127 marks for rent, heat and light, food clothing shoes, shirts, and underwear, toilet articles, beverages and tobacco, household furnishings and miscellaneous. With the mark at par (23.8) this would mean an expenditure of more than $63,554. But the depreciation of the mark brings the expenditure (in gold) down to about $238 for six months. Could an American workman keep a family on $560 a year? In December, 1922 the total expenditures were eight times as large as in July 1922, and those for food ten times as large The expenditures for rent, heat, light and food formed nearly one-half of the total. Wage earners in the U. S. have no kick coming.

MANY BIG FEATURES HAVE BEEN PLANNED

Nearly Every Township In County Represented In Exhibits

Plans have been practically completed for the big Hancock County Fair to be held at Britt, August 28, 29, 30, 31. Entries are coming in for the livestock show, as well as for the agricultural shows. Space is being rapidly reserved and the exhibitors who are coming are requested to make their entries in order that all the local people may be taken care of. Entries in the livestock department closed August 22nd. Livestock exhibitors are also requested to remember that all cattle must have passed a clean Tuberculosis test, and hogs must be vaccinated according to the Iowa State Law.

Township booths will be exhibited by practically every township in the county. This alone will make an excellent show in the Floral hall.

There wil be plenty of amusement for everyone. Ball games have been scheduled for each day. There will be good horse races every day. Five big acts of free attractions have been contracted for, and will be put on before the grandstand each afternoon. The night show will be put on by the Cass-Parker Company, and will be a complete change every night. This is something new in the way of attractions, and will be well worth se

A large amount of the mid-way space has been sold. The concessions that have been contracted for are all good, clean people, and an attempt will be made this year to keep the mid-way clean from all objectionable shows and stands.

Health Exhibit

Children will be weighed and measured as a feature of the health exhibit at the Hancock County Fair. The health booth is under the auspices the Hancock County Pulbic Health Association, Mrs. E. J. Schneir Chairman.

The committee has precured services of Miss Kellman, R. N. s nurse of the Iowa Tuberculosis sociation. Miss Kelman also rent the State Board of Health.

Each child will be given as a souvliener a colored tag stating its height weight and the normal weight for its age and height.

The subject of nutrion is a popular just now and its importance is being more generally recognized all over the country.

Of course it is recognized that the normal weight for one child may not be the same as another of the same age. Extender studies by experts have made allowances for differences in height, in sex, in body build, in race or family stock for the same age.

An excessive variation from the normal weight is regarded, not as proof of something wrong but as a danger signal. For instance, a child is 10 per cent more underweight for his age and height, his parents should take him to the family physician and have him given a thorough examination to find out whether there is any defect or disease which causes the deficiency in weight.

Most frequently it is a case of food eaten too hastily or or under improper conditions, of food improperly prepared.

AUTO PLATES BLACK AND WHITE FOR NEXT YEAR

The auto plates for 1924 are to be black and white it is announced, a black background with white figures The contrast it is said to be much greater than on the 1923 plates. Each plate will cost the state a little over 17 cents.

Women were made before mirrors and have been before them ever since.

WIDOW LEAVES WHITE HOUSE

Mrs. Coolidge and George B. Christian, Jr., Accompany Mrs. Harding.

GOES TO THE M'LEAN HOME

She Expects to Remain at "Friendship," on the Edge of Washington, About Two Weeks Before Going to Marion.

Washington, Aug. 18.—Quietly and almost unnoticed, Mrs. Florence Kling Harding left the White House, never to return except possibly as a guest. None of the crowds, none of the cheers, none of the excitement and none of the pleasurable anticipation that marked her arrival at the executive mansion on March 4, 1921, attended the departure in the gloom of a rainy night.

Shortly before 6 o'clock an automobile drew up to the north portico. It had waited for more than half an hour when another, bearing the coat of arms of the President of the United States, drove up and from it stepped Mrs. Coolidge. She passed within the mansion and it was half an hour later and almost dark before there was another sign of activity.

Two secret service men, the one who has been assigned to Mrs. Harding from the time her late husband was elected president, and the one detailed to Mrs. Coolidge, came out, and then Maj. Ora M. Baldinger, the military aid to the late President.

Dressed in mourning, but without a veil, Mrs. Harding stepped out, followed by Mrs. Coolidge and George B. Christian, Jr., secretary to the late President. Without glancing back and with only one glance to the side at three newspaper men, she walked with firm step to the automobile, which all three entered. Then without word the automobile moved out into Pennsylvania avenue.

Mrs. Harding went to "Friendship," the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. McLean on the edge of Washington. There she expects to stay probably a few days or two weeks before going to Marion.

COAL STRIKE HALTED

Rift in Mine Deadlock Is Made at New York.

Miners Give in on Check-Off and Owners Agree to Cease Practice of Collecting Explosive Accounts by Same Methods.

New York, Aug. 16.—A way to prevent suspension of anthracite coal mining after Sept. 1 was opened by the intervention of the United States coal commission in the deadlock which has hitherto prevailed between the miners' union and the operators.

Officials of the miners' union proposed to the commission to abandon their demand for "check off" of union dues if the operators would cease their practice of collecting explosive and fuel accounts by the same method.

The miners proposal, made in a separate conference with the coal commission, was turned over by the latter to the operators in the ensuing separate conference.

The operators asked time to consider and adjourned. But a few hours later the operators occasioned surprise by giving out the announcement that after a consultation they had agreed to accept the mine union demands in full.

Wage negotiations, which broke off two weeks ago, between the operators and miners now may be resumed, the operators said, in accepting the union proposal.

It is now certain that the negotiations over the wage question will not interfere with the continuance of anthracite production. The "check off" obstacle having been surmounted, the other points in controversy can be settled without a strike, it was intimated by both sides.

Seven Dead, $1,000,000 Loss in Utah Cloudbursts

5-5-3 TREATY IS NOW IN EFFECT

Pacific and Disarmament Pacts Are Ratified by the Several Signatories.

SIMPLE CEREMONIES ARE HELD

Final Ratifications Are Exchanged in the Diplomatic Room of the State Department at Washington—France the Laggard.

Washington, Aug. 17.—The chief treaties of the Washington arms conferences went into effect Friday, when final ratifications were exchanged in the diplomatic room of the State department. This means that France, long regarded as the laggard in the ratifications, at last approved and that the official documents were ready for exchange.

For many months the ratifications of all the other powers have remained with the embassies in Washington. It was simply a question of receiving the ratifications of France.

The action means that the Anglo-Japanese alliance, long regarded as a menace to the safety of the United States, is out of effect, and there is installed therefor the four-power Pacific treaty, which dissolves the British plan for co-operation between Japan and Britain in case of war, and provides that when difficulties arise they shall be submitted to a conference of representatives of the powers for solution.

The treaties as confirmed provide for the limitation of armaments. Under the terms of this agreement the leading naval powers will limit their production of naval armament to the ratio of 5-5-3, with the United States and Great Britain maintaining an equal pace and Japan following in the ratio of three.

France and Italy will continue their naval armament at the ratio of 1.75 as compared with America, Great Britain, and Japan. At the time that the naval treaty becomes effective, the four-power Pacific treaty also will be put into effect. The ceremonies of the exchange of ratifications were simple.

Eberle Now Ranking Officer of Navy

Admiral E. W. Eberle has succeeded Admiral Robert E. Coontz as chief of operations, the ranking officer of the navy. He relinquished at San Diego command of the United States battle fleet to his successor, Admiral S. S. Robison.

Generally looked upon throughout the service as one of the ablest of the officers of high rank, his selection by Secretary Denby was a foregone conclusion for months before the final announcement was made. During his long service he has had probably as comprehensive a career as any officer of the navy, combining service with the officer personnel at Annapolis, contact with the enlisted personnel at various shore establishments and years of service afloat.

In 1914 and 1915 he served as commandant of the Washington navy yard and for four years, from 1915 to 1919, was superintendent of the Naval academy. For his able management of the academy during the strenuous war days when the work there was so expanded to speed up the turning out of officers so badly needed, he was awarded a Distinguished Service Medal. In 1913 Admiral Eberle took a course at the War college.

Born in Denton, Tex., the admiral was appointed to the Naval academy from Arkansas in 1881 and received his commission as ensign in July, 1887. On his detachment from the Naval academy he went to sea in command of one of the battleship divisions and later was given command of the Pacific fleet, his title changing to commander, battle fleet, when the fleet was reorganized.

Senator Hiram Johnson and His Smile

Can you guess why Senator Hiram Johnson wears the smile—a sort of cat-and-canary affair? Well, your guess is as good as anyone's, for the California statesman isn't telling. Anyway, it's the smile he wore when he arrived in New York on the Leviathan from his European tour of inspection. A crowd of his admirers met him—also many newspaper men.

"Yes, I will not be interviewed on domestic politics till I have had a chance to catch up," he said.

In a public address he denounced the plan for America's entry into the world court and intimated that he would tour the country against it. Several among the guests at the dinner shouted at one time or another, "Hiram in 1924." But there was no formal or official launching of a presidential boom.

Perhaps Senator Johnson was smiling with satisfaction with the Leviathan. Anyway, he gazed back at the monster and then said: "One cannot leave a ship like that without some emotion." He had found many passengers on board, he said, who had never thought much of the American merchant marine before. Now, he said, they were "resolved that the Stars and Stripes would be sufficient for them on the seas, and some were resolved that the Stars and Stripes would be sufficient for them on land, too."

Work's Changes in Reclamation Service

Secretary of the Interior Work has taken hold of the United States Reclamation service in earnest. As a result of his activities Director A. P. Davis resigned and D. W. Davis, former governor of Idaho (portrait herewith), was put in charge of the service.

Secretary Work explained that his reasons for accepting the "resignation" of A. P. Davis, former director of the reclamation service were to effect a reorganization of that service in a way that would eliminate the need for "two engineers" and replace one of them with a man who could "help the farmers on the reclamation lands."

"I have Mr. Davis' resignation," Dr. Work said. "We don't need two engineers in charge of the reclamation service. In the future the service head will be known as the chief of the bureau of reclamation, and will be qualified first to aid the farmers, rather than supervise engineering works on the projects. D. W. Davis, former governor of Idaho, is such a man and I have appointed him as the bureau chief, have abolished the office of director and placed F. E. Weymouth, former assistant chief of the service, in the position of chief engineer of the bureau."

Explaining the need for the reorganization, Dr. Work asserted that the government had expended in the 26 reclamation projects of the country $135,000,000; had received only $15,000,000 from the farmers in turn and there was $3,000,000 now due the government, which the farmers could not pay.

He Is Rear Admiral W. A. Moffett Now

In many thousands of homes in the United States the career of Capt. William A. Moffett is watched with interest. This naval officer gained extraordinary popularity and reputation when he commanded the Great Lakes training station during the World war. From the Great Lakes he was assigned to active duty as commander of the battleship Mississippi, then the fastest and most powerful fighting ship afloat. In announcing his appointment to sea duty, Secretary Daniels said:

"No one in the war has accomplished a bigger or better task than Captain Moffett at the Great Lakes station. He has done a wonderful work."

Captain Moffett was next made chief of the navy's bureau of aeronautics.

Now he has been promoted to the grade of rear admiral. Four other captains have been raised with him: Rear Admiral W. D. MacDougall in charge of the naval observatory at Washington; Rear Admiral L. A. Bostwick, chief of staff of the commander of the fleet; Rear Admiral J. L. Latimer, judge advocate general of the navy, and Rear Admiral F. H. Schofield, member of the general board.

HERE'S IOWA'S WORST WEEDS

Preventing Seed Formation Keeps Them Under Control

"One of the best methods of keeping these weeds under control," says Dr. L. H. Pammel head of the department of botany at Iowa State College, "is to prevent the formation f seeds."

Dr. Pammel says that some weews loose their vitality in a short time, while others retain it for years showing that the farmer must prevent the formaion of seed.

AMERICANS HAVE BEEN HEAVY BORROWERS OF ENGLAND DUE TO LOW INTEREST RATES

WASHINGTON, Another pro, was knocked out from under the propaganda that America should rush to the aid of Europe to prevent collapsing,, when on July 5 the Bank of England announced it had raised its interest rate from 3 to 4 per cent in order to check Americans borrowing money in London at a lower rate than they can borrow it at home.

The rate charged by the Bank of England is and has been loaning money for much less than Americans can borrow money. It would seem from this that if there is any surplus capital and credit in this country which the internationalists want to expend to an advantage, it might be well to take care of the agricultural and commercial interests at home before sending it abroad, where interest rates are lower than they are here.

The Associated Press dispatch from London announcing the increase in the rate from 3 per cent to 4 per cent stated:—

"The chief reason for the present increase is to bring the official rate more in line with that of the United States, where the rate for money for some time has ruled more than 1 1-2 per cent above London's. This has induced American traders to borrow money funds in Lombard street, assisting in the depression of American exchange, which is down to $4.55."

Discussing the increase of the rate made by the bank of England, The London Times says.—

"The higher discount rate has been necessitatated by the very liberal extent to which our position as the world's cheapest monetary center has been utilized by overseas borrowers. In particular, the appreciably higher rates ruling in New York have led for some time past to American borrowers resorting to the London Market."

WHAT A PICTURE TO PAINT

U. S. Senator Brookhart from Iowa in speaking at annual picnic of Trades and Labor Asembly in Indianapolis, predicts inequalities of our economic system.

Mr. Brookhart said these groups have reached the common consensus that their interests are identical. and they have been kept apart and at enmity by great combinations of wealth, "which have thrived on profits and ruled in politics by keeping these groups of common Civilization has reached a turning point. It is a universal prediction that a great changes are impending. . ."This unrest is caused by the inequalities of our ecnomic system.

These inequalities have forced the different groups like the farm bloc, labor bloc, soldiers' bloc and mothers' bloc to consider their own interests an deach from its own stand point."

Have these so called different groups or classes been "at each others throats or is not their alleged hatred for one another and their collective hatred of our ecnomic system merely an overdrawn picture which forments class hatred and unrest. -From this statement, a stranger in a foreign country, could picture different classes in U. S. gunning each other or joining hand to extermniate combinations of wealth and industry which, according to Senator Brookhart's accusation have "thrived on keeping these groups of common the proofs and ruled in politics by keeping people at each others throats.

Corner Iowa

SILO TURNS LOSS TO PROFIT IN CORN

Offers Best Means of Realiznig on Poor Crop This Year

The question uppermost in the minds of farmers in this part of Iowa just now is the condition of the corn crop. There is no doubt that drought has injured it though to what extent is not yet determined.

Showers have been extremely local. Some neighborhoods have had no rain since the 4th of July.

In general it may be said that late planted corn has suffered the most in some cases there will be few ears formed and those not well fertilized.

Fields on clay subsoils where they were far enough advanced to be silked and tasseled before the last hot spell will make good corn if enough moisture falls to finish out the ear growth.

On such soils the corn has not been fired. In passing through fields the change in subsoil conditions can be seen clearly. Well drained lands are proving the value of subsoil drainage in dry seasons as the wet.

In the fields of poorest corn there is a possibility of getting something out of the crop by cutting up the corn for fodder or better still by making ensilage of it. is said that one half the feeding value of the ordinary corn plant in in the stalk. When put into a silo it is all edible while if left in the form of dry fodder there is a least one half of it that cattle will not eat.

The silo offers the best means of saving saving a poor corn crop and marketing it in the form of meat or milk when if left standing the stalks will yield practically nothing for all the labor of plowing and cultivation.

Farmers who have silage to feed just now are realizing the value of it as summer feed as well as a winter ration and the short hay crop will call attention more than ever to the value of a silo as a means of providing winter feed out of the corn field. The man with a silo can cut down his meadow acreage one half and use it for other crops. He can salvage a mighty poor crop of corn and make some money out of the wreck.

The arguments against the silo or ensilage usually come from those who have not had one and the fact that all diary districts are plentifuly supplied with silos is one of the best reasons for considering building one and the beef men are not far behind the diarymen in their regard for it.

BUY LAND NOW SAY LAND BANK

E. G. Quamme, Federal Farm Land Bank So Advises.

E. G. Quamme, president of the Federal Farm Bank, told a convention of Minnesota Realty men the other day that now is the time to buy farm lands. He said hat farming will be better and more profitable every year from now on, the upward trend to continue for perhaps thirty years or longer. Land values reached rock bottom in this section last October Mr. Quamme declares and are now on the up curve and will continue to advance. He said in part: "There is a real and potential demand for land sales every year. This situation must be taken care of in regular and systematic manner. Otherwise there will result a congestion and damming up which, if allowed to run long enough will lay the foundation of an unnatural demand and another land boom This is the condition that confronts us now. As the result of the land products, people have bought little or no land the past four years. The natural and potentiol demand has been dammed up and waiting. It will break loose one of tese days, and there is danger that it will approach boom conditions again unless it is controlled.

Reason for Slump

'People are just as wrong now in not buying land as they were wron when they all wanted to buy land 1919. What are they waiting for" Three things stand out as the p. cipal factors that are causing buyers to hold.

'First, they have been waiting for better prices for farm products, better farm income, in other words or better times in farming.

"Second, they have been waiting for and values to go to rock bottom.

"Third, they have been waiting for interest rates to go to the lowest point.

"In answer to all this it can be said that we have now seen the worst farming conditions. We are now on the upward grade and farming will be better and more profitable every year from now on. We are on the up curve again, a curve that will take us for a continuous swing upward for perhaps thirty years or longer. It may be gradual but it will be on the up curve, and that is the soundest and best period to enter as an investor. Land values have deflated in this section to rock bottom. Bottom was reached last October and we are now on the up curve.

Not to go Lower

"Good farming land will not go lower it will go higher from now on We have noted this tendency very carefully, and it is not local but general. The man that is waiting for lower prices before he buys will, if he waits longer, pay a higher price instead. Rates of interest have gone down to per-war levels. Interest rates have gone down to pre-war levels. Interest rates for real estate capital investment credit will not go any lower. There is, therefore no sound or fundamental reason for holding off and not buying land now."

ROBBERS AT ROWAN

Robbers visited our town Saturday night, breaking in shortly after midnight. At the D. W. Whitten general store they secured about $15 from the cash register and several pairs of silk hose. The safe had been tampered with but they were not able to break the lock.

At the drug store they secured between $15 and $20.

At the garage they gained entrance through a broken window glass. Nothing was found to be missing here.

At the Standard Oil Station they helped themselves to some gasoline and we presume went merilly on their way.

TWO APPLE PICKINGS PAY

Practice adapted Only To Small Orchards With Summer Varieties.

Practice Adapted Only to Small Orchards With Summer Varieties.

In some cases in marketing summer apples, such as the Yellow Transparent or the Duchess it pays to make two pickings, taking only the fruit that is ready the first time and leaving that which is too green for the second. This procedure has been found profitable by H. H. Plagge of the pomology section of the Iowa State College, for small orchards.

In preparing summer apples for market, Mr. Plagge says that a better price is graded to size and color. This will not be difficult and it repays for the time necessary to do it.

"The best package to use for summer varieties is the bushel basket," Mr. Plage says. This has proved the best as the Duchess and Yellow Transparent cannot be stored more than two weeks and the bushel basket is economical to use. Mr. Plage believes that it pays to sell first those apples that will keep the shortest length of time.

AN APPALLING RECORD

Forty people a month on an average will meet death in accidents on the Iowa Highway during the next three or four months. This will average considerable more than one death per day. This statement is based upon the records for the past seven years. There is no reason to 1923 will be any different from any other year. It behooves everybody that drives on the highways, especially during July, August and September to use precaution. Wild eyed joy riders and heavily loaded tourists driving for speed records will be whirling their way over the Iowa roads with the utmost speed and abandon. These things are against the law is true but so long as there is no authority capable of preventing them it is simply the part of good sense to recognize that this situation does exist on Iowa highways. Every man driving a car must be on the alert at all times to ers. In almost every town of any size campaigns are on at present to teach the necessity of more careful driving on the highways, but in spite of these the accidents as shown by ther records coming into the highway commission offies are increasing daily. An annual summary of the accidents of 1922 appear in this issue of the service bulletin. Read and study the tabulation and then do everything in your power to reduce the cause of these accidents. Every sane driver on the highways for the next few months at least should keep in mind that he must do double duty, first in protecting himself from other drivers, and second protecting the fool driver from his own recklessness.— Iowa Service

BELMOND OPPOSED TO REMOVING TWO TRAINS.

BELMOND. —A resolution by the Chamber of Commerce protested against the proposal to cease operating trains No. 435 and 436 between Iowa Falls and Esterville, has been passed by that group. The business men feel that the service of these trains is required for the good of their businesses; that they depend more on these two trains than any others which enter the city, as thru them only from 15 to 20 hours is required to reach wholesale and banking centers, which without the service they would rended 48 hours would be necessary to get the same results.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING

Herman D. Stelhorn Had A Narraw Escape.

Herman D. Stelhorn was struck by lightning during the storm early last Tuesday morning, an lives to tell the story, altho there are only a few who had similiar experiences, who were alive to tell of it afterward.

During the storm he got up and looked out of the window of his bedroom, as was no doubt the case with many other persons in the city. It was thundering and lightning and all of a sudden Mr. Stellhorn felt his right side become numb, and called to his wife, who assisted him back to bed. He hardly knew what had happened to him, but on examination he discovered the lightning had struck him on the right breast, run down to his knee and then jumped over onto his left foot.

He sustained several blisters on both of his legs and foot, but is now able to be at his work in the Camp bell grocery store. He can't account how the lightning came into the house, or how it went out, as there are no other marks, either inside or outside, nor on the trees in the yard. It was surely a narrow escape from death for Mr. Stellhorn.

First National Bank

"The Bank for Everybody".

KEEP AMERICA'S WAMPUM SOUND!

By SAMUEL H. BEACH,

President, Savings Bank Division, American Bankers Association.

Although the United States is today upon a solid gold basis, we nevertheless know of our own knowledge what inflation means. It would take long to recall in detail the bitter experiences which this nation suffered during the Civil War and the years which followed it, and in our present easy condition we might think such conditions could never again arise. But with such men as Henry Ford and Thomas A. Edison talking about commodity money there is no foretelling what may happen.

S. H. Beach

One of the plainest lessons taught by financial history is that whenever a nation issues paper money with nothing back of it, that nation is on the road to disaster. Look at Russia with its worthless rubles and Germany with its worthless marks. Think of what happened in France during the years immediately following our Revolutionary War.

The common people of France rose in their might, tore down the Bastile, and made reprisal for centuries of kingly crime and oppression. The profligate court had piled up taxes until they were unbearable. The enraged populace killed King Louis XVI, and also his queen, Marie Antoinette. But they only threw themselves out of the frying pan into the fire so far as finances were concerned.

Unsound Money Tyranny

At the very worst point of their currency inflation they found themselves under the absolute domination of Robespierre. In order to meet the growing scarcity of coin, paper money called assignats were issued. First 400,000,000 francs worth, then 800,000,000 were added with the distinct understanding that the 1,200,000,000 would be the full extent of the issue. This pledge was soon broken and further issues brought the total up to 3,700,000,000 francs.

Frightful depreciation was the inevitable result; and legislation was passed making it a crime, with six years' imprisonment as the penalty, if any one should refuse to take the paper assignats at their face value. Just think of it! A French peasant after working the entire year to produce a crop was compelled by law to accept payment for that crop in paper money, which he knew to be worthless, or go to prison.

It was simply legalized robbery. When the penalty was increased to twenty years imprisonment the inevitable climax came. The Reign of Terror was at its height. Robespierre was in supreme power. He suggested that more assignats be issued and if the people did not take them the guillotine should be the penalty.

Robespierre's End

This unheard of outrage was more than the people could stand. An unknown man arose on the floor of the convention and denounced Robespierre, reciting the heinous crimes he had committed, and so worked upon the feelings of the audience that Robespierre, the tyrant, became Robespierre, the convicted criminal. Two days later he was led to the guillotine. France had learned her financial lesson well—that money must have value back of it.

The fallacy of unsound money is sure to confront us again. Never is there enough of everything for all the people. The struggle for existence is a real struggle, and those who find themselves in the lower strata of human society are ready at any time to grasp at fiat money or any of the other things which misguided politicians hold out to them.

My whole purpose is to drive home the fact that danger lies ahead and to urge every one to let no opportunity go by to use voice and influence toward keeping the wampum of these United States, as it is today, the soundest currency in the world.

SOME BANK SALARIES

Investigations made by the Missouri Bankers Association have revealed that 368 banks in the state in towns of under 2,000 population are paying their cashiers and chief executives an average of only $110 a month. Only 273 of the 1,162 reporting banks in towns under 5,000 population pay the president a salary. The report says:

"It indicates that, even allowing for the economy of living in small communities, the cashiers and managing officers of those 1,162 banks, who receive an average of $140 per month, either must have personal means to begin with, or must maintain the standards necessary to their positions as the leaders of their communities and the builders of the commonwealth by means of 'side lines,' such as selling insurance, collecting commissions on farm loans, and trading in real estate."

PAPER MONEY PIPE DREAMS

By JOHN OAKWOOD

Hitting the pipe seems like the greatest way in the world to get something for nothing,—a whole paradise full of joy for a few whiffs of opium smoke. But—

* * *

By the way, the big lure about fiat money is that it seems to promise about as much for nothing as a whiff on the pipe. They are just coming out of such a dream now in Germany.

* * *

Here is the way that German soft money dream goes. Say in 1913 a man put a ten year mortgage for 20,000 marks on his farm. Marks were then worth, in gold, about four to the dollar. The debt, therefore, was equivalent to about $5,000.

* * *

In the ten years since that debt was contracted, the German Government has published, so to speak, trillions of paper marks. What happened? What would happen to the price of eggs if they had a hen at Washington laying a billion eggs a day,—even if they put a government stamp on them saying eggs were worth a quarter a piece? German marks have gone down from four to the dollar to 120,000 to the dollar.

* * *

Here is where the pipe dream gets

* * *

Before the war, with marks worth 24 cents gold, the deposits of the thrifty in German savings banks were worth over five billion dollars. Today, although these deposits have multiplied many fold in terms of marks, their real value is only about half a million dollars gold. That is what a "loose money" plan does for common folks.

Pipe dreams are wonderful while they last—but shattered health, misery and despair are the final penalty The ones who profit are the dope sellers. Unsound money is a pipe dream—and the penalty is economic ruin, misery and despair for the majority. The ones who profit are the speculators.

Her and friends were kindly and persistent in their entreaties go back East with them. She to go. It was not going that it was how and when and what circumstances she was to ust roused in her disturbing Before she went East she wanted to have fixed in mind her future relation to the ranch and the West. When the crucial hour arrived she found that the West had not claimed her yet. These old friends had warmed cold ties.

It turned out, however, that there need be no hurry about making the decision. Madeline would have welcomed any excuse to procrastinate; but, as it happened, a letter from Alfred made her departure out of the question for the present. He wrote that his trip to California had been very profitable, that he had a proposition for Madeline from a large cattle company, and, particularly, that he wanted to marry Florence soon after his arrival home and would bring a minister from Douglas for that purpose.

Madeline went so far, however, as to promise Helen and her friends that she would go East soon, at the very latest by Thanksgiving. With that promise they were reluctantly content to say goodby to the ranch and to her.

Helen's eyes had a sweet, grave, yet mocking light as she said: "Majesty, bring Stewart with you when you come. He'll be the rage."

Madeline treated the remark with the same merry lightness with which it was received by the others; but after the train had pulled out and she was on her way home she remembered Helen's words and looks with something almost amounting to a shock. Any mention of Stewart, any thought of him, displeased her.

"What did Helen mean?" mused Madeline. And she pondered. That mocking light in Helen's eyes had been simply an ironical glint, a cynical gleam from that worldly experience so suspicious and tolerant in its wisdom. The sweet gravity of Helen's look had been a deeper and more subtle thing. Madeline wanted to understand it, to divine in it a new relation between Helen and herself, something fine and sisterly that might lead to love. The thought, however, revolving around a strange suggestion of Stewart, was poisoned at its inception, and she dismissed it.

Upon the drive in to the ranch, as she was passing the lower lake, she saw Stewart walking listlessly along the shore. When he became aware of the approach of the car he suddenly awakened from his aimless sauntering and disappeared quickly in the shade of the shrubbery. This was not by any means the first time Madeline had seen him avoid a possible meeting with her. Somehow the act had pained her, though affording her a relief. She did not want to meet him face to face.

It was annoying for her to guess that Stillwell had something to say in Stewart's defense. The old cattleman was evidently distressed. Several times he had tried to open a conversation with Madeline relating to Stewart; she had evaded him until the last time, when his persistence had brought a cold and final refusal to hear another word about the foreman. Stillwell had been crushed.

As days passed Stewart remained at the ranch without his old faithfulness to his work. Madeline was not moved to a kinder frame of mind to see him wandering dejectedly around. It hurt her, and because it hurt her she grew all the harder.

A telegram from Douglas, heralding the coming of Alfred and a minister, put an end to Madeline's brooding, and she shared something of Florence Kingsley's excitement. The cowboys were as eager and gossipy as girls. It was arranged to have the wedding ceremony performed in Madeline's great hall-chamber, and the dinner in the cool, flower-scented patio.

Alfred and his minister arrived at the ranch in the big white car. They appeared considerably wind-blown. In fact, the minister was breathless, almost sightless, and certainly hatless. Alfred, used as he was to wind and speed, remarked that he did not wonder at Nels' aversion to riding a fleeting cannon-ball. The imperturbable Link took off his cap and goggles and, consulting his watch, made his usual apologetic report to Madeline, deploring the fact that a teamster and a few stray cattle on the road had held him down to the manana time of only a mile a minute.

Arrangements for the wedding brought Alfred's delighted approval. When he had learned all Florence and Madeline would tell him he expressed a desire to have the cowboys attend; and then he went on to talk about California, where he was going to take Florence on a short trip.

On the following day Alfred and Florence were married. Florence's sister and several friends from El Cajon were present, besides Madeline, Stillwell, and his men. It was Alfred's express wish that Stewart attend the ceremony. Madeline was amused when she noticed the painfully suppressed excitement of the cowboys. For them a wedding must have been an unusual and impressive event. She began to have a better understanding of the nature of it when they cast off restraint and pressed forward to kiss the bride. In all her life Madeline had never seen a bride kissed so much and so heartily, nor one so flushed and disheveled and happy. This indeed was a joyful occasion.

The dinner began quietly enough with the cowboys divided between embarrassment and voracious appetites that they evidently feared to indulge. Wine, however, loosened their tongues, and when Stillwell got up to make the speech everybody seemed to expect of him they greeted him with a roar.

Stillwell was now one huge, mountainous smile. He was so happy that he appeared on the verge of tears. He rambled on ecstatically till he came to raise his glass.

"An' now, girls an' boys, let's all drink to the bride an' groom; to their sincere an' lastin' love; to their happiness an' prosperity; to their good health an' long life. Let's drink to the unitin' of the East with the West. No man full of red blood an' the real breath of life could resist a Western girl an' a good hoss an' God's free land—that open country out there. So we claim Al Hammond, an' may we be true to him. An', friends, I think it fittin' that we drink to his sister an' to our hopes. Heah's to the lady we hope to make our Majesty! Heah's to the man who'll come ridin' out of the West, a fine, big-hearted man with a fast hoss an' a strong rope, an' may he win an' hold her! come, friends, drink."

A heavy pound of horses' hoofs and a yell outside arrested Stillwell's voice and halted his hand in midair.

The patio became as silent as an unoccupied room.

Through the open doors and windows of Madeline's chamber burst the sounds of horses stamping to a halt, then harsh speech of men, and a low cry of a woman in pain.

Rapid steps crossed the porch, entered Madeline's room. Nels appeared in the doorway. Madeline was surprised to see that he had not been at the dinner-table. She was disturbed at sight of his face.

"Stewart, you're wanted outdoors," called Nels, bluntly. "Monty, you slope out here with me. You, Nick, an' Stillwell—I reckon the rest of you hed better shut the dors an' stay inside."

Nels disappeared. Quick as a cat Monty glided out. Madeline heard his soft, swift steps pass from her room into her office. He had left his guns there. Madeline trembled. She saw Stewart get up quietly and without any change of expression on his dark, sad face leave the patio. Nick Steele followed him. Stillwell dropped his wine-glass. As it broke, shivering the silence, his huge smile vanished. His face set into the old cragginess and the red slowly thickened into black. Stillwell went out and closed the door behind him.

Then there was a blank silence. The enjoyment of the moment had been rudely disrupted. Madeline glanced down the lines of brown faces to see the pleasure fade into the old familiar hardness.

"What's wrong?" asked Alfred, rather stupidly. The change of mood had been too rapid for him. Suddenly he awakened, thoroughly aroused at the interruption. "I'm going to see who's butted in here to spoil our dinner," he said, and strode out.

He returned before any one at the table had spoken or moved, and now the dull red of anger mottled his forehead.

"It's the sheriff of El Cajon!" he exclaimed, contemptuously. "Pat Hawe with some of his touch deputies come to arrest Gene Stewart. They've got that poor little Mexican girl out there tied on a horse. Confound that sheriff!"

Madeline calmly rose from the table, eluding Florence's retreating hand, and started for the door. The cowboys jumped up. Alfred barred her progress.

"Alfred, I am going out," she said.

"No, I guess not," he replied. "That's no place for you. Maybe there'll be a fight. You can do nothing. You must not go."

"Perhaps I can prevent trouble," she replied.

As she left the patio she was aware that Alfred, with Florence at his side and the cowboys behind, were starting to follow her. When she got out of her room upon the porch she heard several men in loud, angry discussion. Then, at sight of Bonita helplessly and cruelly bound upon a horse, pale and disheveled and suffering, Madeline experienced the thrill that sight or mention of this girl always gave her. It yielded to a hot pang in her breast—that live pain which so shamed her. But almost instantly, as a second glance showed an agony in Bonita's face, her bruised arms where the rope bit deep into the flesh, her little brown hands stained with blood, Madeline was overcome by pity for the unfortunate girl and a woman's righteous passion at such barbarous treatment of one of her own sex.

The man holding the bridle of the horse on which Bonita had been bound was at once recognized by Madeline as the big-bodied, bullet-headed guerrilla who had found the basket of wine in the spring at camp. Redder of face, blacker of beard, coarser of aspect, evidently under the influence of liquor, he was as fierce-looking as a gorilla and as repulsive. Besides him there were three other men present, all mounted on weary horses. The one in the foreground, gaunt, sharp-featured, red-eyed, with a pointed beard, she recognized as the sheriff of El Cajon.

Stillwell saw Madeline, and, throwing up his hands, roared to be heard. This quieted the gesticulating, quarreling men.

"Wal now, Pat Howe, what's drivin' you like a locoed steer on the rampage?" demanded Stillwell.

"Keep in the traces, Bill," replied Hawe. "You savvy what I come fer. I've been bidin' my time. But I'm ready now. I'm hyar to arrest a criminal."

The huge frame of the old cattleman jerked as if he had been stabbed. His face turned purple.

"What criminal?" he shouted, hoarsely.

The sheriff flicked his quirt against his dirty boot, and he twisted his thin lips into a leer.

"Why, Bill, I knowed you hed a no-good outfit ridin' this range; but I wasn't wise thet you hed more'n one criminal."

"Cut that talk! Which cowboy are you wantin' to arrest?"

Hawe's manner altered.

"Gene Stewart," he replied, curtly.

"On what charge?"

"Fer killin' a Greaser one night last fall."

"So you're still harpin' on that? Pat, you're on the wrong trail. You can't lay that killin' onto Stewart. The thing's ancient by now. But if you insist on bringin' him to court, let the arrest go today—we're havin' some fiesta hyar—an' I'll fetch Gene in to El Cajon."

"Nope. I reckon I'll take him when I got the chance, before he slopes."

"I'm givin' you my word," thundered Stillwell.

"I reckon I don't hev to take your word, Bill, or anybody else's."

Stillwell's great bulk quivered with his rage, yet he made a successful effort to control it.

"See hyar, Pat Hawe, I know what's reasonable. Law is law. But in this country there always has been an' is now a safe an' sane way to proceed with the law. Mebbe you've forgot that. I'm a-goin' to give you a hunch. Pat, you're not overliked in these parts. You've rid too much with a high hand. Some of your deals hev been shady, an' don't you overlook what I'm sayin'. But you're the sheriff, an' I'm respectin' your office. I'm respectin' it this much. If the milk of human decency is so soured in your breast that you can't hev a kind feelin', then try to avoid the onpleasantness that'll result from any contrary move on your part today. Do you get that hunch?"

"Stillwell, you're threatenin' an officer," replied Hawe, angrily. "I come to arrest him, an' I'm goin' to."

"So that's your game!" shouted Stillwell. "We-all are glad to get you straight, Pat. Now listen, you cheap, red-eyed coyote of a sheriff! You don't care how many enemies you make. You know you'll never get office again in this county. What do you care now? It's amazin' strange how earnest you are to hunt down the man who killed that particular Greaser. I reckon there's been some dozen or more killin's of Greasers in the last year. Why don't you take to trailin' some of them killin's? I'll tell you why. You're afraid to go near the border. An' your hate of Gene Stewart makes you want to hound him an' put him where he's never been yet—in jail. You want to spite his friends. Wal, listen, you lean-jawed, skunk-bitten coyote! Go ahead an' try to arrest him!"

Stillwell took one mighty stride off the porch. His last words had been cold. His rage appeared to have been transferred to Hawe. The sheriff had begun to stutter and shake a lanky red hand at the cattleman when Stewart stepped out.

"Here, you fellows, give me a chance to say a word."

As Stewart appeared the Mexican girl suddenly seemed vitalized out of her stupor. She strained at her bonds, as if to lift her hands beseechingly. A flush animated her haggard face, and her big eyes lighted.

"Senor Gene!" she moaned. "Help me! I so seek. They beat me, rope me, 'mos' keel me. Oh, help me, Senor Gene!"

"Shut up, er I'll gag you," said the man who held Bonita's horse.

"Muzzle her, Sneed, if she blabs again," called Hawe.

Madeline felt something tense and strained working in the short silence. Was it only a phase of her thrilling excitement? Her swift glance showed the faces of Nels and Monty and Nick to be brooding, cold, watchful. She wondered why Stewart did not look toward Bonita. He, too, was now dark-faced, cool, quiet, with something ominous about him.

"Hawe, I'll submit to arrest without any fuss," he said, slowly, "if you'll take the ropes off that girl."

"Nope," replied the sheriff. "She got away from me onct. She's hawg-tied now, an' she'll stay hawg-tied."

Madeline thought she saw Stewart give a slight start. But an unaccountable dimness came over her eyes, at brief intervals obscuring her keen sight.

"All right, let's hurry out of here," said Stewart. "You've made annoyance enough. Ride down to the corral with me. I'll get my horse and go with you."

"Hold on!" yelled Hawe, as Stewart turned away. "Not so fast. Who's doin' this? You'll ride one of my pack-horses, an' you'll go in irons."

"You want to handcuff me?" queried Stewart, with sudden swift start of passion.

"Want to? Haw, haw! Nope, Stewart, thet jest my way with hoss-thieves, raiders Greasers, murderers, an' sich. See hyar, you Sneed, git off an' put the irons on this man."

The guerrilla called Sneed slid off his horse and began to fumble in his saddle-bags.

Stillwell was gazing at Stewart in a kind of imploring amaze.

"Gene, you ain't goin' to stand fer them handcuffs?" he pleaded.

"Yes," replied the cowboy. "Bill, old friend, I'm an outsider here. There's no call for Miss Hammond and —and her brother and Florence to be worried further about me. Their happy day has already been spoiled on my account. I want to get out quick."

"Wal, you might be too d—n considerate of Miss Hammond's sensitive feelin's." There was now no trace of the courteous, kindly old rancher. He looked harder than stone. "How about my feelin's? I want to know if you're goin' to let this sneakin' coyote, this last gasp of the old rum-guzzlin' frontier sheriffs, put you in irons an' hawg-tie you an' drive you off to jail?"

"Senor Gene!" She Moaned. "Help Me! I So Seek."

"Yes," replied Stewart, steadily.

"Wal, by Gawd! You, Gene Stewart! What's come over you? Why, man, go in the house, an' I'll 'tend to this feller. Then tomorrow you can ride in an' give yourself up like a gentleman."

"No. I'll go. Thanks, Bill, for the way you and the boys would stick to me. Hurry, Hawe, before my mind changes."

His voice broke at last, betraying the wonderful control he had kept over his passions. As he ceased speaking he seemed suddenly to become spiritless. He dropped his head.

When the man Sneed came forward, jingling the iron fetters, Madeline's blood turned to fire. She would have forgiven Stewart then for lapsing into the kind of cowboy it had been her blind and sickly sentiment to abhor. This was a man's West—a man's game. At that moment, with her blood hot and racing, she would have gloried in the violence which she had so deplored: she would have welcomed the action that had characterized Stewart's treatment of Don Carlos; she had in her the sudden dawning temper of a woman who had been assimilating the life and nature around her and who would not have turned her eyes away from a harsh and bloody deed.

But Stewart held forth his hands to be manacled. Then Madeline heard her own voice burst out in a ringing, imperious "Wait!"

Sneed dropped the manacles. Stewart's face took on a chalky whiteness. Hawe, in a slow, stupid embarrassment beyond his control, removed his sombrero in a respect that seemed wrenched from him.

"Mr. Hawe, I can prove to you that Stewart was not concerned in any way whatever with the crime for which you want to arrest him."

The sheriff's stare underwent a blinking change. He coughed, stammered, and tried to speak. Manifestly, he had been thrown completely off his balance. Astonishment slowly merged into discomfiture.

Similar Woods Differ in Tests.

Osage orange and black locust are much alike in structure, strength, durability and color, although the former usually has more of a golden brownish tinge. These two woods can readily be distinguished by the fact that osage orange gives off a yellowish color if wrapped in a wet rag or placed on a soaked blotter, while black locust gives off practically no color under the same conditions.

WORKER FOR LEGION BUDDIES

Robert G. Simmons, Nebraska Congressman, Has Done Much for Ex-Service Men.

Robert G. Simmons, congressman from Nebraska, is a democratic sort of a chap, and doesn't hesitate to tell about it. He keeps a Holstein cow, drives a popular touring car, and hobnobs with his neighbors, particularly those who are members of the American Legion in his home town of Scotsbluff, Neb., where he has made his way up to the position he now holds.

Simmons was born in a sod house on a western Nebraska homestead, sixty miles from a railroad. His early life was like that of any youngster of the western country. He had to help earn his way by farm labor, janitor work, messenger duty and odd jobs. When he attended college at Hastings he mowed lawns, washed dishes and tended furnaces to pay his expenses.

He entered the military service in 1917 at Fort Omaha, Neb., as a private first class, but when discharged in 1919, had been elevated to the rank of second lieutenant, air service. Mr. Simmons is a lawyer, and was county attorney at the time of his enlistment.

He served one term as commander of the Nebraska department of the American Legion, during which time certain legislation favored by the Legion was successfully enacted. He was active in securing the passage of a law establishing a $2,000,000 endowment fund, income from which is expended by the American Legion in the state for the benefit of needy ex-service men. Interest in the affairs of the ex-service men of the nation is a deep concern of the Nebraska congressman and he expects to devote a great deal of time to the Legion's program for relief of disabled.

PLAN TO TEACH AMERICANISM

Illinois Legion Commander Arranges for Broad Campaign During School Vacation.

Every school child in Illinois will hear a weekly message of Americanism during the school year, according to announced plans of the Illinois department of the American Legion, in accepting an outline of work from Commander Charles W. Schick of that state.

Commander Schick plans that every Legion post in the state's 102 counties will assign certain members of the organization to speak in each schoolroom in the cities and each school in country districts every week during the school year, carrying a message of better citizenship to the youth of America.

In this manner the Illinois Legion man believes that such careful training aiming toward a better understanding of rights and privileges of citizenship will result in rapid assimilation of aliens in the state as well as assisting in raising the standard of citizenship of those already in possession of these rights.

Co-operation by members of the Legion with churches and other agencies in preparing citizens for naturalization is included in Commander Schick's plans. Prospective citizens will receive thorough training in the requirements for naturalization, so that the applicant will be familiar with American history and institutions before the final papers are awarded. Because church life is closer to the home it is hoped that the Legion, working through the various denominations, may realize on this plan for citizenship.

El Paso to Welcome Veterans.

Legionnaires who travel to San Francisco for the annual convention of the American Legion, may pass through El Paso, Tex., where a reception awaits them. The local Legion post started the idea, which was joined in by the El Paso Chamber of Commerce, army officials and railroads entering the city. A feature of the visit of each delegation will be a short trip into old Mexico, across the international bridge into Juarez. Automobiles will be furnished for this trip. The invitation holds good for either the coming or going trips of the Legion travelers, or both, according to the El Paso committee.

Only Auxiliary Baseball Team.

Members of the American Legion auxiliary in Stanton, Ia., are believed to have formed the only baseball team composed of woman relatives of former service men. A challenge to the team of any other unit has been made by the Stanton nine.

The High Cost of Upkeep

You remember the man who won an elephant at a 25 cent raffle. Initial cost was low but, Oh Boy! the upkeep.

White elephants are being ing bought every day. And the vlaue—determined by the initial cost divided by the number of years service less yearly upkeep—applies not only to white elephants but to clothing, furniture, machinery, anw even to community enterprises.

Take Cows. A srub cow may be bought for $50, but she eats as much or more as a thoro bred cow, demands as much more milking hands to gather the same amount of milk. The upkeep is very high, it is obvious, because what she consumes it worth almost as much as what she produces—i. e. her service value.

When selecting machinery the same proposition arises. The buying cost of some machinery may be low but the service value low.

When buying a tractor do not buy according to purchase price alone, but figure the expense of upkeep. But the tractor that has a good ser- than it is on some other makes, but the service value it gives for the invice value. The McCormick-Deering tractor is of the thorough type. The purchase price may be a little higher vestment can't be beat. Buy a McCormick Deering.

CALVIN COOLIDGE—PRESIDENT

By John T. Adams.

Calvin Coolidge has the complete confinedne and unqualified support of the American people in taking up the heavy duties and burdens of the office of Presient of the United States. This confidence is based upon President Coolidge's private character and public record.

President Harding had no one who gave him more unselfish loyality or faithful service. During his Vice-presidency, Mr. Coolidge regarded Mr. Harding as his chief and leader in the fullest an finest sense of those terms. His sincerity was constantly evidenced in the active. tireless work he preformed in support of the administration.

Mr. Coolidge was the first Vice-President who occupied a seat in the cabinent. President Harding's decesion to make Vive President Coolidge one of his official family, in fact as well as theory, was evidence of the high regard the President entertained for Mr. Coolidges judgement. In view of the tragic occurrences. this act of President Harding seems providential. President Coolidge now assumes the responsibilities of the chief excutive with an intimate knowledge of the problem of th nation and polices of the administration.

President Coolidge's ability in this emergency to inspire confidence and give reassurance is due not only to his temperament and attainments, but also to his long and sucessful experience in the public positions of great responsibility and authority.

He is admirably equipped for the great task confronting him. He comes from sturdy American stock who loved their home, their country and their God. His ancestry, like himself, were of the soil plain people of democratic instincts and ideals. He possesses the fine qualities of thrift, industry rugged integrity, a keen sense of justice and fairness, a tremendous capacity for work, the ability to make decisions after due counsel and deliberation, and the firmness necessary to make them effective.

To his natural characteristics and his intellectual attainments, there has been added a training of years in the capacity of a public legislator and evecutive. He served Massachusetts as a member of the state senate and as president of tha tbody, as lieutentant governor and two terms as governor.

Massachuetts is one of the greatest commonwealths in inndustry, agriculture, finance, business and ship ping. Its problems are varied and in themselves form a cross-section of the problems of the United States. It has been progressive. Its labor laws tax laws, budget system of handling state finances, its administration of charitable and penal institutions, have all been taken as models by other states and have attracted the students of economic and social problems from all over he world.

It is no small honor to be goevrnor of Massachuetts, no small task to fill the position. Its list of governors embrace some of the best known names in American history. Calvin Coolidge after serving the people of his state in the state legislature, and again as lieutanant governor, was twice elected by them, upon his record, to fill the highest office within their gift . Their faith was fully justified. He added another name to long list of great state executives.

Presidents Coolidge's character and training is a guarantee of the stability of our government under his guidance. His faith in America, his reverence for her institutions, his devotion to her welfare, his concern for her honor and integrity, and his sympathetic understanding of her people all unite to make it fortunate that he is the one, in this hour of stress, to take the leadership of his countrymen.

SEED WHEAT AT LESS COST

May Follow Soy Beans without Further Preparation

A method for reducing the cost of preparing the seed bed for winter wheat that has become popular during the last few years, is that of seeding the wheat on soil from which a crop of soy beans, if they have been properly cultivated, leave the soil good physical condition for growing winter wheat, according to H. D. Hughes, head of the farm crops section of Iowa State College.

Since ground that has just produced a crop of soy beans needs no further preparation for winter wheat, the drill follows the binder as the beans are being harvested. However, under certain conditions it will pay to disc the ground. Soy beans fit economically into the rotation of corn, soy beans, winter wheat and clover.

"Winter wheat and soy beans may well be used," declares Professor Hughes, "to replace a considerable part of the oat acreage in this state. More and more the practice is gaining favor and it is has certain advantages to commend it."

If the winter wheat is to be seeded on ground that has grown a crop of oats, it will have to be plowed or disced. Good results will be secured if the land is plowed four or five inches deep instead of as much as six inches. The deeper furrow cuts off the soil moisture which reaches the plant roots by capillary action .If the season is dry, the plow should not go deeper than four inches.

Cummins Gets Salary Boosted

Senator Cummins will receive a salary of $20,000 per year now that he is president of the Sneate. The vice president otherwise held that office, but now we have no vice prseident. In addition to the $12,000 salary the vice president got, he will receive the regular $7,500 paid members of congress. He will also have a private car and chauffer furnished by the government. He is surely sitting pretty. It is said he has his eyes on the presidency.

SWEET CLOVER IS FAVORITE

Farmers in North Increase Acreage, Extension Man Says.

"The greatest change in Northern agricultural in recen years," declares F. G. Churchill of the Extension Service of Iowa State College, 'is in the amount and the extent to which sweet clover is being grown today." Mr. Churchill has just returned from a trip thru northern Iowa, Minnesota, South Dakota and North Dakota and Southern Canada.

"Farmers in the northern sections put in the sweet clover with their small grains," says Mr. Churchill. After the small grain is removed, they either use the sweet clover for pasture or hay ro for seed. It is said to keep the weeds down effectively. Some farmers let the clover grow and plow it under the following spring for manure.

"Wher e the soil is sweet, this variety of clover is an effective builder of the soil, enriching it by storing nitrogen and furnishing great quantities of humas material," Mr. Churchill says. When properly used, sweet clover makes an economical feed, in his opinion. At the North Dakota Experiment Station, eight two-year old steers were being pastured solely on four acres of sweet clover in a test to find out the capacity of the plant to feed.

Cedar Rapids Boosters to Visit Klemme Soon

The Cedar Rapids Wholesalers manufacturers, bankers and other business men of the Chamber of Commerce will be in Klemme, Wednesday, September 12th from 10:44 to 11:00 a. m.

The visitors will call upon the business men of our city interested in their respective lines and hope to find them at their places of business during the time of their visit.

These visits are for the purpose of forming a better acquaintance and understanding between the wholesalers, manufacturers and other institutions and their customers throughout the state. The history of the past excursions proves the great benifits result from these trips. Year after year the merchant orders from the wholesader, jobber or factory through their salesman by mail, but seldom, if ever, has an opportunity ofmeeting the head of the institution from which he buys his goods. On these trips however, he meets face to face and shakes hands with the head of the house, which promotes a feeling of good fellowship and a better understanding of thier mutual problems.

The business men are traveling in a specially chartered train consisting of pullmans, Dining Car, Club Car and Day Coach. This will bring to our city about 100 representatives of Cedar Rapids institutions, including the famous Hanford Post, American Legion band. This band is made up of veterans of the World War and present a very attractive appearance in their uniforms of French Blue. Their repertoire contains, not only selections from the classics, but they play all the popular selections as well. The band carries two soloiss which adds greatly to the variety of the program offered.

Cedar Rapids was one of the first cities in Iowa to inaugurate "Good Will Tours" and has been conducting them sucessfully for over 18 years. This year's tour leaves Cedar Rapids, Monday evening, September 10th, and will visit Klemme Wednesday morning from 10:44 to 11:00.

JOHN HAMMILL TAKES POSITION OF ACTING GOVERNOR

KILLS SELF AFTER KILLING HIS FAVORITE TEAM

The remains of Earl Gillette, a former resident of Iowa, who grew up near Klemme, were found last Saturday following his disappearance on May 2nd. His body was brought by his twin brother to Clear Lake where it was buried Wednesday.

Diligent search for the man in May was of no avail, but when cutting the tall grass in a ravine, skeletons of the man and his team along with the wagon to which the dead horses were still hitched were found.

A bullet entering his forehead had passed trough his brain .

Both horses also had bullets in their heads.

In his pockets were found a purse with over $5 and a pocket knife.

The young man had been despondent following eviction from his land because of failure to make a payment. Love for his fine team led him to shoot them so that they might fall into no other hands.

Young Gillette left considerable stock unincumbered in the care of neighbors.

He is survived by his brother and a physically frail and heart broken mother, who live on a farm between Ventura and Clear Lake.

NEW BIBLE TO BE PUBLISHED SOON

Translated Into Tongue of Average American by Chicago Man

CHICAGO, Aug. 28—A bible, translated into the colloquial tongue of the "average American," will soon be off the press.

The work has just been completed by Dr. Edgar J. Goodsped, chairman of the new testament department of the University of Chicago ,it was learned today.

British forms of expression , such as "husbandman" for "farmer", have been eliminated in the translation made from the original Greeks.

Grammatical researches and papyrus discoveries, Dr. Goodspeed said, have fully established that the New Testament was written in the common everyday language of the times of the Apostles.

"I have taken advantage of these advances," Dr. Goodspeed said, "and endeavored to produce a translation of the new testament which will have a little more of the ease, clearness an force than I have found in the current versions.

"I have undertaken to determine what each writer of the New Testament meant to say and then I have tried to express this in the simplest and most vigorous English of the same kind as he Greek of the original.

'I' have tried to eliminate British forms of expression' and to use only words intelligible to the American ear."

An example of the Goodspeed version, as it will probably be shown to biblical scholars, follows in the translation of the miraccle of the fishes.

"The disciples said unto Him, "Where can we get bread enough in this solitude to feed such a crowd?"

Jesus said on to them ,'How many loaves have you?'

"They said. 'Seven and a few small fish.'

"Then he ordered the people to take their places on the ground, and He took the seven loaves and the fish and gave thanks and gave them to His disciples and the disciples gave them to the people. And they all ate and satisfied their hunger, And the pieces that were left that they picked up filled seven baskets. There were 4,000 men that were fed, besides women and children. And He dismissed the people and got in to the boat and went to the district of Magadan."

Dr. Goodspeed devoed three and a half years to his transuation of the New Testament whicr probably will be ready for circulation about December 1.

BREAD BIGGEST ITEM IN AVERAGE PERSON'S DIET

Bread takes a more prominent place than any other single article of food in the diet of the average person. It is usually served at every meal and often is the chief item. This is due, says the Bureau of Home conomics of the United States Department of Agriculture, to the fact that bread contains certain food materials needed for health, and is inexpensive, wholesome, palatable and very generally available.

When it sells at 10 cents a pound, bread furnishes body fuel or energy at about 8 cents a thousand calories. There are few common foods that supply fuel in so cheap a form. The man who works hard with his muscles can safely eat a pound or two a day without crowding out all the other tihngs he must have.

Bread is useful not only for fuel but also to some extent as a mucle building food. If made from the whole grain, it contributes no inconsiderable amount to supply of mineral substances needed. Milk supplements it in some ways very well and as a combination of bread and milk is therefore a more nearly complete food than either bread or milk alone.

It did not take science to tell our ancestors that bread, milk and berries make a good supper, but science has confirmed their opinion by proving that the combination provides almost everything needed for health,-to the latest word in dietetics—vitmins.

PINCHOT CALLED IN MINE CRISIS

Hard Coal Strike Is Ordered; Pennsylvania Governor Last Peace Hope.

CALLS PARLEY AS ARBITER

Coolidge Appoints Him as Emissary of the President in Final Effort to Avert Walkout—Hurries to Coal Fields.

Atlantic City, N. J., Aug. 25.—Philip Murray, international vice president of the United Mine Workers of America, announced at the close of a session at the Hotel Ambassador that the full scale committee of the anthracite miners had authorized the drawing up of a proclamation covering the suspension of 155,000 mine workers on the expiration of the present working contract on September 1.

No provision has been made for the exemption of the 4,000 maintenance men necessary to keep the mines from floating owing to the failure of any provision by the operators, miners said, for the basis of payment and the hours of work for these men during the suspension.

This announcement was a considerable surprise to A. B. Jessup, acting spokesman for the operators, who asserted that always in the past the miners had permitted the retention of the engineers and pumpmen in order to protect the properties.

When word was brought to the miners and operators that President Coolidge had delegated to Governor Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania full power as federal mediator to prevent if possible the impending mine strike, both sides expressed their willingness to attend another conference.

Washington, Aug. 25.—Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania has been delegated by President Coolidge to attempt to bring miners and operators of the hard coal fields into a new wage agreement before September 1, it was announced at the White House.

The selection was made by the President following a conference at the executive mansion with John Hays Hammond, United States coal commissioner.

Governor Pinchot issued the following statement when he left the White House:

"The President has been good enough to call me into conference on the coal situation and has asked me to do what I can to help in finding a solution. I have refrained from taking any action until I knew that it was agrreable to the President that I should do so. Now I shall proceed to get in touch with the miners and operators promptly after I reach Harrisburg."

ADOPTS ITALY'S PLAN

Germany Is Now in the Grip of a Dictator.

New Premier Takes Drastic Measures in Effort to Save His Country From Ruin—May Seize Great Fortunes.

Berlin, Aug. 23.—Chancellor Stresemann called the reichstag party leaders to his office here and announced that he was taking dictatorial measurees to save Germany from ruin.

The party leaders pledged their confidence in him by agreeing to permit Herr Stresemann to carry out his dictatorial measures without consulting the reichstag. This is legal under paragraph 48 of the constitution of Weimar, which places in the hands of the president in the most stringent times the fullest power necessary for restoring national order. The president and chancellor are authorized to enforce any measures they may decree without consulting the cabinet or reichstag. Chancellor Stresemann decided on the dictatorship after several conferences with President Ebert.

"This is the last parliamentary cabinet in Germany," said Herr Stresemann to the political leaders. "After us there can be only violence."

Herr Stresemann announced his first measure will be one designated to obtain about $100,000,000 of the immense sums of foreign money which German magnates are hiding, through "voluntary contributions." Everybody will have to take an oath as to his holdings of foreign currency and false returns will be punished severely and by confiscation of property.

NAVY TO FIGHT $70,000,000 CUT

President Warned Department Must Have Money to Be Made Efficient.

HARDING'S STAND IS CITED

Late President Opposed the Slash, Acting Secretary Roosevelt Will Tell Budget Director Lord When He Returns to Capital.

Washington, Aug. 24.—When Budget Director Lord returns from his vacation, September 5, he will be told by Acting Secretary Roosevelt that the navy's $375,000,000 budget was approved by the late President Harding, it was learned semiofficially Thursday.

President Coolidge is understood to have indicated he would back up Mr. Harding's wishes to the limit.

The late executive was fully alive to the dangers of unpreparedness, and is said to have planned to emphasize strongly in his message to congress the need of bringing the navy up to the ratio allowed under the five-power treaty.

The proposed cut of more than $70,000,000, therefore, came as a decided shock to the naval establishment.

Bureau chiefs have been busy several days revising their estimates, but all efforts to cut have amounted to robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Many items are inadequate when considered in the broad scheme of national defense.

With the near approach of the Sixty-eighth session of congress, the navy is well prepared for the annual assault upon Capitol Hill. Colonel Roosevelt and his council are gathering the opinions of numerous leading Americans who, returning from Europe, have advised the United States to keep out of the European quagmire and to establish more coast defenses.

These opinions will be presented along with the statistical part of the argument.

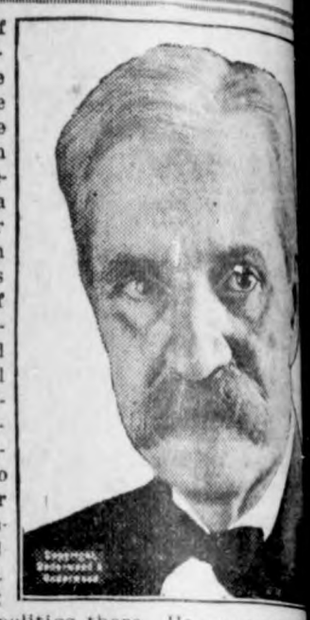
WHO'S WHO—AT WALDORF

Cummins to Preside Over U. S. Sen



Senator Albert B. Cummins of Iowa (portrait herewith) will presumably preside over the senate in the Sixty-eighth congress, taking the place of President Coolidge, who, as vice president was the presiding officer in the Sixty-seventh congress. The Republicans, in that event, will lose a vote, except in case of a tie. Senator Cummins is a veteran, having been in the senate since 1906, when he was elected to fill the unexpired term of Senator Allison. He was born in Carmichaels, Pa., Feb. 15, 1850. Educated at Waynesburg college and at Cornell in civil engineering, he became assistant chief engineer of the Cincinnati, Richmond & Fort Wayne railroad. Later he studied law in Chicago and was admitted to the Illinois bar in 1875, practicing law in Chicago until 1878. He married Miss Ida L. Gallery of Eaton Rapids, Mich., in 1874. In 1878 he moved to Iowa and almost immediately became a factor in state politics there. He was a member national Republican committee from 1896 to 1900.

Lecturer Earns and Gives $5,000,

Rev. Dr. Russell H. Conwell recently was awarded the $10,000 provided by Edward H. Bok to be given each year to that citizen who has given the most outstanding service to the city of Philadelphia. Thirty-six years ago an institution of learning known as Temple university was founded by him, having a register of seven students, and resources of fifty-five cents in cash. The other day thousands of graduates of the university gathered in Philadelphia to witness the laying of the corner stone of a new $1,000,000 building. Rodgers Calls "Law, Not War" Unsou

At the Institute of Politi Williamstown, Mass., the other Rear Admiral William L. Ro president of the general board o navy (portrait herewith) was o the speakers at the open confe on "How the World Is Mana Diplomacy, International Law, F Admiral Rodgers' subject was "Role of Force." He attacked "Law, not war" slogan as una He said, among other things:

"It is unsound, for war its an integral part of law. War i agency whereby law is made to vail when it is disputed by evil be they individuals or nations.

"The appeal to law and to le of nations as the agencies of law hope to be successful in secu peace only when a desire for mony on the whole outweighs causes for opposition. In the pre stage of world development, the lic opinion of the world as a whole has not abandoned nationalism. Int tionalism is not yet acceptable. The world must be governed under con as they exist, namely, by nations with divergent interests which refuse reconciled. Armaments are therefore necessary to all, or one armed nati rule the others. Armed nations are less likely to be subject to oppressi injustice than others."

Placards around the hotel invited suggestions from the patrons, so one guest ventured to offer something in this line.

When Frank Miller was in Nebraska the past week getting married. a big hail storm came up and raised Cain with his car. It hailed so hard that the hail runied the auto top, broke the wind-shield and hail hit so hard it dented the hood and fenders. Other cars parked in the yard suffered a like fate. The windows in the house were broken and crops were pounded into the ground and leaves and limbs literally sheared from the trees.

Ye Editor and family returned Sunday from our vacation spent at Lincoln, Nebr., where Mrs. Jorgenson's folks were having a family reunion. There are four girls and three boys in the Davis family and all are married and scattered all over the United States and they came from Los Angeles, Cal.; Salt Lake City, Utah; New Orleans, La.; Sheridan, Wyoming; Klemme, Iowa; and two daughters live in Lincoln as do the parents. With the four grandchildren present there were 20 persons at the table—and it was a long one. Dad Davis had twenty-four spring chickens and they lasted for about three dinners (Iowa got their share.) We sure had a fine time at the re-union. The next one will be held at Salt Lake City in two years. The crops in Nebraska are not near as good as in this locality. In fact the crops are better here than in a great many places in the state. In the viciniy of Rockwell City they have the best corn we have seen this year.

BARRELS FLY IN FIRE AT TITONKA

Triangle Garage Destroyed; Oil Caske Thrown High; Cars Saved

TITONKA:—The Triangle Motor company garage owned by Guy Brun and Harold Dissmer was destroyed by fire Monay morning at 2 o'clock. The fire originated from loose wire connections.

Vernon Klink, employee, who was sleeping in the garage, discovered the fire and gave the alarm. Before help reached him he had moved all the cars and the Hawkeye Gas truck to safety.

About four carload of posts burned in the French Lumber yard dajoining, the men carried about two carloads to a safe place.

The fire wagon from Algona was called and came over in forty minutes but the fire had gained such a headway and the surrounding buildings were well protected that they did not operate. About 700 gallons of lubricating oil belonging to the Hawkeye company was destroyed. One of the barrels went up in the air about one hundred feet and exploded in Mr. Madje's yard about 2 hundred and fifty feet from the fire.

The total loss is estimated at $10.000 part of which was covere by insurance.

—16—

"It was absolutely impossible for Stewart to have been connected with that assault," went on Madeline, swiftly, "for he was with me in the waiting room of the station at the moment the assault was made outside. The door was open. I heard the voices of quarreling men. The language was Spanish. I heard a woman's voice mingling with the others. It, too, was Spanish, and I could not understand. But the tone was beseeching. Then I heard footsteps on the gravel. Just outside the door then there were hoarse, furious voices, a scuffle, a muffled shot, a woman's cry, the thud of a falling body, and rapid footsteps of a man running away. Next, the girl Bonita staggered into the door. She was white, trembling, terror-stricken. She recognized Stewart, appealed to him. Stewart supported her and endeavored to calm her. He asked her if Danny Mains had been shot, or if he had done the shooting. The girl said no. She told Stewart that she had danced a little, flirted a little with vaqueros, and they had quarreled over her. Then Stewart took her outside and put her upon his horse. I saw the girl ride that horse down the street to disappear in the darkness."

While Madeline spoke another change appeared to be working in the man Hawe. His sharp features fixed in an expression of craft.

"Thet's mighty interestin', Miss Hammond, 'most as interestin' as a story book," he said. "Now, since you're so obligin' a witness, I'd sure like to put a question or two. What time did you arrive at El Cajon thet night?"

"It was after eleven o'clock," replied Madeline.

"Nobody there to meet you?"

"No."

"The station agent an' operator both gone?"

"Yes."

"How soon did this feller Stewart show up?" Hawe continued, with a wry smile.

"Very soon after my arrival. I think—perhaps fifteen minutes, possibly a little more."

"An' what time was the Greaser shot?" queried Hawe, with his little eyes gleaming like coals.

"Probably close to half past one. It was two o'clock when I looked at my watch at Florence Kingsley's house. Directly after Stewart sent Bonita away he took me to Miss Kingsley's. So, allowing for the walk and a few minutes conversation with her, I can pretty definitely say the shooting took place at about half past one."

Stillwell heaved his big frame a step closer to the sheriff.

"What 're you drivin' at?" he roared, his face black again.

"Evidence," snapped Hawe.

Madeline marveled at this interruption; and as Stewart irresistibly drew her glance she saw him gray-faced as ashes, shaking, utterly unnerved.

"I thank you, Miss Hammond," he said, huskily. "But you needn't answer any more of Hawe's questions. He's—he's— It's not necessary. I'll go with him now, under arrest. Bonita will corroborate your testimony in court, and that will save me from this—this man's spite."

Madeline, looking at Stewart, seeing a humility she at first took for cowardice, suddenly divined that it was not fear for himself which made him dread further disclosures of that night, but fear for her—fear of shame she might suffer through him.

Pat Hawe cocked his head to one side, like a vulture about to strike with his beak, and cunningly eyed Madeline.

"Considered as testimony, what you've said is sure important an' conclusive. But I'm calculatin' thet the court will want to hev explained why you stayed from eleven-thirty till one-thirty in thet waitin' room alone with Stewart."

His deliberate speech met with what Madeline imagined a remarkable reception from Stewart, who gave a tigerish start; from Stillwell, whose big hands tore at the neck of his shirt, as if he was choking; from Alfred, who now strode hotly forward, to be stopped by the cold and silent Nels; from Monty Price, who uttered a violent "Aw!" which was both a hiss and a roar.

In the rush of her thought Madeline could not interpret the meaning of these things which seemed so strange at that moment. But they were portentous. Even as she was forming a reply to Hawe's speech she felt a chill creep over her.

"Stewart detained me in the waiting room," she said, clear-voiced as a bell. "But we were not alone—all the time."

For a moment the only sound following her words was a gasp from Stewart. Hawe's face became transformed with a hideous amaze and joy.

"Detained?" he whispered, craning his lean and corded neck. "How's thet?"

"Stewart was drunk. He—"

With sudden passionate gesture of despair Stewart appealed to her:

"Oh, Miss Hammond, don't! don't! don't! . . ."

Then he seemed to sink down, head lowered upon his breast, in utter shame. Stillwell's great hand swept to the bowed shoulder, and he turned to Madeline.

"Miss Majesty, I reckon you'd be wise to tell all," said the old cattleman, gravely. "There ain't one of us who could misunderstand any motive or act of yours. Mebbe a stroke of lightnin' might clear this murky air. Whatever Gene Stewart did that unlucky night—you tell it."

Madeline's dignity and self-possession had been disturbed by Stewart's importunity. She broke into swift, disconnected speech:

"He came into the station—a few minutes after I got there. I asked—to be shown to a hotel. He said there wasn't any that would accommodate married women. He grasped my hand—looked for a wedding-ring. Then I saw he was—he was intoxicated. He told me he would go for a hotel porter. But he came back with a padre—Padre Marcos. The poor priest was—terribly frightened. So was I. Stewart had turned into a devil. He fired his gun at the padre's feet. He pushed me onto a bench. Again he shot—right before my face. I—I nearly fainted. But I heard him cursing the padre—heard the padre praying or chanting—I didn't know what. Stewart tried to make me say things in Spanish. All at once he asked my name. I told him. He jerked at my veil. I took it off. Then he threw his gun down—pushed the padre out of the door. That was just before the vaqueros approached with Bonita. Padre Marcos must have seen them—must have heard them. After that Stewart grew quickly sober. He told me he had been drinking at a wedding—I remember, it was Ed Linton's wedding. Then he explained—the boys were always gambling—he wagered he would marry the first girl who arrived at El Cajon. I happened to be the first one. He tried to force me to marry him. The rest—relating to the assault on the vaquero—I have already told you."

Madeline ended, out of breath and panting, with her hands pressed upon her heaving bosom.

Hawe rolled his red eyes and threw back his head.

"Ho, ho, ho! Ho, ho, ho! Say, Sneed, you didn't miss any of it, did ye? Haw, haw! Best I ever heerd in all my born days. Ho, ho!"

Then he ceased laughing, and with glinting gaze upon Madeline, insolent and vicious and savage, he began to drawl:

"Wal now, my lady, I reckon your story, if it tallies with Bonita's an' Padre Marcos', will clear Gene Stewart in the eyes of the court." Here he grew slower, more biting, sharper and harder of face. "But you needn't expect Pat Hawe or the court to swaller thet part of your story—about bein' detained unwillin'!"

Madeline had not time to grasp the sense of his last words. Stewart had convulsively sprung upward, white as chalk. As he leaped at Hawe Stillwell interposed his huge bulk and wrapped his arms around Stewart. There was a brief, whirling, wrestling struggle. Stewart appeared to be besting the old cattleman.

"Help, boys, help!" yelled Stillwell. "I can't hold him. Hurry, or there's goin' to be blood spilled!"

Nick Steele and several cowboys leaped to Stillwell's assistance.

"Gene! Why, Gene!" panted the old cattleman. "Sure you're locoed—to act this way. Cool down! Cool down! Why, boy, it's all right. Jest stand still—give us a chance to talk to you. It's only ole Bill, you know—your ole pal who's tried to be a daddy to you. He's only wantin' you to hev sense—to be cool—to wait."

"Let me go! Let me go!" cried Stewart; and the poignancy of that cry pierced Madeline's heart. "Let me go, Bill, if you're my friend. I saved your life once—over in the desert. You swore you'd never forget. Boys, make him let me go! Oh, I don't care what Hawe's said or done to me! It was that about her! Are you all a lot of Greasers? How can you stand it? D—n you for a lot of cowards! There's a limit, I tell you." Then his voice broke, fell to a whisper. "Bill, dear old Bill, let me go. I'll kill him! You know I'll kill him!"

"He Wagered He Would Marry the First Girl Who Arrived at El Cajon."

"Gene, I know you'd kill him if you hed an even break," replied Stillwell, soothingly. "But, Gene, why, you ain't even packin' a gun! An' there's Pat lookin' nasty, with his hand nervous-like. He seen you hed no gun. He'd jump at the chance to plug you now, an' then holler about opposition to the law. Cool down, son; it'll all come right."

Suddenly Madeline was transfixed by a terrible sound. Her startled glance shifted from the anxious group round Stewart to see that Monty Price had leaped off the porch. He crouched down with his hands below his hips, where the big guns swung. From his distorted lips issued that sound which was combined roar and bellow and Indian war-whoop, and, more than all, a horrible warning cry. He was quivering, vibrating. His eyes, black and hot, were fastened with most piercing intentness upon Hawe and Sneed.

"Git back, Bill, git back!" he roared. "Git 'em back!"

With one lunge Stillwell shoved Stewart and Nick and the other cowboys upon the porch. Then he crowded Madeline and Alfred and Florence to the wall, tried to force them farther. His motions were rapid and stern. But failing to get them through door and windows, he planted his wide person between the women and danger. Madeline grasped his arm, held on, and peered fearfully from behind his broad shoulder.

"You, Hawe! You, Sneed!" called Monty, in that same wild voice. "Don't you move a finger er an eyelash!"

Madeline's faculties nerved to keen, thrilling divination. She grasped the relation between Monty's terrible cry and the strange hunched posture he had assumed.

"Nels, git in this!" yelled Monty; and all the time he never shifted his intent gaze as much as a hair's-breadth from Hawe and his deputy. "Nels, chase away them two fellers hangin' back there. Chase 'em, quick!"

These men, the two deputies who had remained in the background with the pack-horses, did not wait for Nels. They spurred their mounts, wheeled, and galloped away.

"Now, Nels, cut the gurl loose," ordered Monty.

Nels ran forward, jerked the halter out of Sneed's hand, and pulled Bonita's horse in close to the porch. As he slit the rope which bound her she fell into his arms.

"Hawe, git down!" went on Monty. "Face front an' stiff!"

The sheriff swung his leg, and, never moving his hands, with his face now a deathly, sickening white, he slid to the ground.

"Line up there beside your guerrilla pard. There! You two make a d—n fine pictoor, a d—n fine team of pizened coyote an' a cross between a wild mule an' a Greaser. Now listen!"

Monty made a long pause, in which his breathing was plainly audible.

Madeline's eyes were riveted upon Monty. Her mind, swift as lightning, had gathered the subtleties in action and word succeeding his domination of the men. Violence, terrible violence, the thing she had felt, the thing she had feared, the thing she had sought to eliminate from among her cowboys, was, after many months, about to be enacted before her eyes. It had come at last. She had softened Stillwell, she had influenced Nels, she had changed Stewart; but this little black-faced, terrible Monty Price now rose, as it were, out of his past wild years, and no power on earth or in heaven could stay his hand. With eyes slowly hazing red, she watched him; she listened with thrumming ears; she waited, slowly sagging against Stillwell.

"Hawe, if you an' your dirty pard hev loved the sound of human voice, then listen an' listen hard," said Monty. "Fer I've been goin' contrary to my ole style jest to hev a talk with you. You all but got away on your nerve, didn't you? 'Cause why? You roll in here like a mad steer an' flash yer badge an' talk mean, then almost bluff away with it. You heerd all about Miss Hammond's cowboy outfit stoppin' drinkin' an' cussin' an' packin' guns. They've took on religion an' decent livin', an' sure they'll be easy to hobble an' drive to jail. Hawe, listen. There was a good an' noble an' be-ootiful woman come out of the East somewheres, an' she brought a lot of sunshine an' happiness an' new idees into the tough lives of cowboys. I reckon it's beyond you to know what she come to mean to them. Wal, I'll tell you. They-all went clean out of their heads. They-all got soft an' easy an' sweet-tempered. They got so they couldn't kill a coyote, a crippled calf in a mud-hole. Even me—an ole, worn-out, hobble-legged, burned-up cowman like me! Do you git thet? An' you, Mister Hawe, you come along, not satisfied with ropin' an' beatin', an' Gaw knows what else, of thet friendless little Bonita; you come along an' face the lady we fellers honor an' love an' reverence, an' you—you— H—l's fire!"

With whistling breath, foaming at the mouth, Monty Price crouched lower, hands at his hips, and he edged inch by inch farther out from the porch, closer to Hawe and Sneed. Madeline saw them only in the blurred fringe of her sight. They resembled specters. She heard the shrill whistle of a horse and recognized Majesty calling her from the corral.

"Thet's all!" roared Monty, in a voice now strangling. Lower and lower he bent, a terrible figure of ferocity.

"Now, both you armed officers of the law, come on! Flash your guns! Throw 'em, an' be quick! Monty Price is done! There'll be daylight through you both before you fan a hammer! But I'm givin' you a chanst to sting me. You holler law, an' my way is the ole law."

His breath came quicker, his voice grew hoarser, and he crouched lower. All his body except his rigid arms quivered with a wonderful muscular convulsion.

"Dogs! Skunks! Buzzards! Flash them guns, er I'll flash mine! Aha!"

To Madeline it seemed the three stiff, crouching men leaped into instant and united action. She saw streaks of fire—streaks of smoke. Then a crashing volley deafened her. It ceased as quickly. Smoke veiled the scene. Slowly it drifted away to disclose three fallen men, one of whom, Monty, leaned on his left hand, a smoking gun in his right. He watched for a movement from the other two. It did not come. Then, with a terrible smile, he slid back and stretched out.

Lower and Lower He Bent, a Terrible Figure of Ferocity.

CHAPTER XIX

Unbridled.

In waking and sleeping hours, Madeline Hammond could not release herself from the thralling memory of that tragedy. She was haunted by Monty Price's terrible smile. Only in action of some kind could she escape; and to that end she worked, she walked and rode. She even overcame a strong feeling, which she feared was unreasonable disgust, for the Mexican girl Bonita, who lay ill at the ranch, bruised and feverish, in need of skillful nursing.

One afternoon she rode down to the alfalfa fields, round them, and back up to the spillway of the lower lake, where a group of mesquite-trees, owing to the water that seeped through the sand to their roots, had taken on bloom and beauty of renewed life. Under these trees there was shade enough to make a pleasant place to linger. Madeline dismounted, desiring to rest a little.

Her horse, Majesty, tossed his head and flung his mane and switched his tail at the flies. He would rather have been cutting the wind down the valley slope. Madeline sat with her back against a tree, and took off her sombrero. Suddenly Majesty picked up his long ears and snorted. Then Madeline heard a slow pad of hoofs. A horse was approaching from the direction of the lake. Madeline had learned to be wary, and, mounting Majesty, she turned him toward the open. A moment later she felt glad of her caution, for, looking back between the trees, she saw Stewart leading a horse into the grove. She would as lief have met a guerrilla as this cowboy.

Majesty had broken into a trot when a shrill whistle rent the air. The horse leaped and, wheeling so swiftly that he nearly unseated Madeline, he charged back straight for the mesquites. Madeline spoke to him, cried angrily at him, pulled with all her strength upon the bridle, but was helplessly unable to stop him. He whistled a piercing blast. Madeline realized then that Stewart, his old master, had called him and that nothing could turn him. She gave up trying, and the horse thumped into an aisle between the trees and, stopping before Stewart, whinnied eagerly.

"I want to talk to you," said Stewart.

Madeline started, turned to him, and now she saw the earlier Stewart, the man who reminded her of their first meeting at El Cajon, of that memorable meeting at Chiricahua.

"I want to ask you something," he went on. "I've been wanting to know something. That's why I've hung on here. But now I'm going over—over the border. And I want to know. Why did you refuse to listen to me?"

At his last words that hot shame, tenfold more stifling than when it had before humiliated Madeline, rushed over her, sending the scarlet in a wave to her temples. Biting her lips to hold back speech, she jerked on Majesty's bridle, struck him with her whip, spurred him. Stewart's iron arm held the horse. Then Madeline, in a flash of passion, struck at Stewart's face, missed it, struck again, and hit. With one pull, almost drawing her from the saddle, he tore the whip from her hands. It was not that action on his part, or the sudden strong masterfulness of his look, so much as the livid mark on his face where the whip had lashed that quieted, if it did not check, her fury.

"That's nothng," he said, with something of his old audacity. "That's nothing to how you've hurt me."

Madeline battled with herself for control. This man would not be denied. About him now there was only the ghost of that finer, gentler man she had helped to bring into being. The piercing dark eyes he bent upon her burned her, went through her as if he were looking into her soul. Then Madeline's quick sight caught a fleeting doubt, a wistfulness, a surprised and saddened certainty in his eyes, saw it shade and pass away. Her woman's intuition, as keen as her sight, told her Stewart in that moment had sustained a shock of bitter, final truth.

For the third time he repeated his question to her. Madeline did not answer; she could not speak.

"You don't know I love you, do you?" he continued, passionately. "That ever since you stood before me in that hole at Chiricahua I've loved you? You can't see I've been another man, loving you, working for you, living for you? You won't believe I've turned my back on the old wild life, that I've been decent and honorable and happy and useful—your kind of a cowboy? You couldn't tell, though I loved you, that I never wanted you to know it, that I never dared to think of you except as my angel, my holy Virgin? What do you know of a man's heart and soul? How could you tell of the love, the salvation of a man who's lived his life in the silence and loneliness? Who could teach you the actual truth—that a wild cowboy, faithless to mother and sister, except in memory, riding a hard, drunken trail straight to hell, had looked into the face, the eyes of a beautiful woman infinitely beyond him, above him, and had so loved her that he was saved—that he became faithful again—that he saw her face in every flower and her eyes in the blue heaven?"

Madeline was mute. She heard her heart thundering in her ears.

Stewart leaped at her. His powerful hand closed on her arm. She trembled. His action presaged the old instinctive violence.

"No; but you think I kept Bonita up in the mountains, that I went secretly to meet her, that all the while I served you I was— Oh, I know what you think! I know now. I never knew till I made you look at me. Now, say it! Speak!"

White-hot, blinded, utterly in the fiery grasp of passion, powerless to stem the rush of a word both shameful and revealing and fatal, Madeline cried:

"Yes!"

He had wrenched that word from her, but he was not subtle enough, not versed in the mystery of woman's motive enough, to divine the deep significance of her reply.

For him the word had only literal meaning confirming the dishonor in which she held him. Dropping her arm, he shrank back, a strange action for the savage and crude man she judged him to be.

"But that day at Chiricahua you spoke of faith," he burst out. "You said the greatest thing in the world was faith in human nature. You said you had faith in me! You made me have faith in myself!"

His reproach, without bitterness or scorn, was a lash to her old egoistic belief in her fairness. She had preached a beautiful principle that she had failed to live up to.

"You think I am vile," he said. "You think that about Bonita! And all the time I've been . . . I could make you ashamed—I could tell you—"

His passionate utterance ceased with a snap of his teeth. His lips set in a thin, bitter line. The agitation of his face preceded a conclusive wrestling of his shoulders.

"No, no!" he panted. Was it his answer to some mighty temptation? Then, like a bent sapling released, he sprang erect. "But I'll be the man—the dog—you think me!"

He laid hold of her arm with rude, powerful clutch. One pull drew her sliding half out of the saddle into his arms. She fell with her breast against his, not wholly free of stirrups or horse, and there she hung, utterly powerless. Maddened, writhing, she tore to release herself. All she could accomplish was to twist herself, raise herself high enough to see his face. That almost paralyzed her. Did he mean to kill her? Then he wrapped his arms around her and crushed her tighter, close to him. She felt the pound of his heart; her own seemed to have frozen. Then he pressed his burning lips to hers. It was a long, terrible kiss. She felt him shake.

"Oh, Stewart! I—implore—you—let—me—go!" she whispered.

LEGION MAN IS IN BASEBALL

John J. Sullivan, Author of Slacker Resolution, One of Purchasers of Seattle Club.

A fast baseball club for Seattle is one of the aims of John J. Sullivan of Seattle, an active member of the American Legion. He has joined Wade Killefer, formerly manager of the Los Angeles club of the Pacific Coast league, and Charles J. Lockard, well-known Washington business man in the purchase of the club. Harry Wolverton, ace-of-managers of pennant-chasing ball clubs in the West, was selected to lead the club.

Sullivan was born in Massachusetts, but preferred the thrilling environment of the West to the classic surroundings of Cape Cod. He arrived in Seattle in 1904 and set about to complete his education in law in the University of Washington. A poor boy, Sullivan paid his way through the school by holding down a job in the post office. After his admission to the legal profession, he became assistant United States district attorney, and later assistant to the attorney general in Washington. In this legal capacity he served as counsel in many of the most important cases in the West, among them being the prosecution and ultimate conviction of I. W. W. members, who shot down four members of the American Legion in Centralia, Wash., on Armistice day, 1920. Eleven of the thirteen accused men were convicted. Another case of importance with which Sullivan was connected was that of the defense of Madalyn Obenchain and Arthur Burch, accused of the slaying of J. Belton Kennedy, who were freed after three juries had failed to convict them.

Sullivan's connection with baseball originated when he participated in the case of the Seattle Pacific Coast league club against gamblers who sought damages from park owners for their ejection. The Supreme court ruled against the gamblers, the decision now being frequently used to invoke the right of eviction in other cities. On winning this case, Sullivan associated himself with the new purchasers of the Seattle baseball club, and is out to help win the pennant.

During the war Sullivan was an enlisted man in the military intelligence section, playing a prominent part in the settlement of strikes among government workers in the Northwest during the war. He was one of the incorporators of the American Legion, when congress officially established the organization. He was the author of the "alien slacker" resolution adopted by the Legion, and was named to head the Legion's first national committee on the Japanese question.

LEGION IS AN AID TO LABOR

President of Illinois Federation Praises Work of Former Service Men's Organization.

Praise of the work of the American Legion in behalf of the laboring man was voiced by President John Walker of the Illinois Federation of Labor at a recent state conference of Legion commanders and adjutants of Illinois.

"Unionism is indebted to the Legion for the fight you waged against unrestricted immigration which prevented the dumping of foreign hordes upon our shores to destroy the standard of living and of wages," he said. "No union man can help but feel grateful to you for this."

President Walker showed how much a part of one another the Legion and Federation are by quoting some figures:

"In the last war," he said, "there were 680,000 American fighters bearing union cards. But if there had not been a trade unionist in that war, union men could not help but stand for the same principles that are contained in your constitution.

"You have pledged your co-operation in two endeavors of unionism to wipe out illiteracy from this country, and in the campaign for Americanism. A bill has recently gone through the legislature raising the educational requirements of children who have to work from the sixth to the eighth grades. Another law provides kindergartens for poor children and another an education for crippled children. There is a bill now pending to reclaim the mentally defective children."

President Walker declared that at the next convention of the Illinois Federation of Labor he would call to the attention of the executive committee the relationship of labor and the Legion and predicted that labor would back the Legion 100 per cent.

STATEMENT

While we take pleasure in extending credit to our customers at all times, there is a limit to everything. It can be overdone by neglecting to pay Stille's some money on the account now and then as it takes kale to run a business. You might run a wheel barrow without grease, but you can't run a business without money.

Please step into our office the next time you're in town and surprise us with a good big check, that we have been looking for for a long time. Please don't forget.

There is more or less charity in the heart of every man—usually less.

A tight man and a loose dog are equally dangerous.

A STOMACH AUXILIARY

We've often heard of auxiliaries for various things—helpers, so to speak—but a "stomach auxiliary" is a new thing only in words. Animals are inclined to only half digest their food and if you wish to fatten your stock in the quickest and most inexpensive way, a good thing to help their stomachs to wholly digest their food. Grind their feed before you feed it!

In this way the International feed grinder aids the digestion of feed for your stock and is to a certain extent an auxiliary to the animal's stomach.

International feed grinders are of rigid construction. A pulley bracket or third bearing on the type B machine keeps the bearing in alignment serves to lenghthen the life of the machine. The machines are made in three types and three sizes, 6, 8, and 10 inch. They grind from 10 to 96 bushels an hour depending on conditions and amount of power. Come in and look them over.

A TALE of old New Orleans this, in the days when fair ladies were still the cause of duels at sunrise, when young bloods of French and Spanish regime blithely gambled away their last penny at Maspero's.

Mr. Jackson does his bit toward bringing the historical romance back to popularity. His theme is one to inspire a writer, and he leaves nothing to be desired in the rendering of it.

As already proven in his earlier novels, he has steeped himself in not only the history but the atmosphere of those Homeric days when fearless, if often lawless, men were strengthening the life of the young Republic of the West, and the stories of whose deeds have a blood-stirring appeal which time but makes the stronger.

SOME OF IOWA'S NEW INDUTRIAL IMPROVEMENTS

KEEPING THE TAXES DOWN

Recently there appeared a statemenl that at the end of the fiscal year a surplus existed in the treasury.

When it was suggested that a reduction of taxes might follow, Senator Reed Smoot of Utah warned the public that taxes could not be reduced. The Utah Senator is more frank than some other Senators and does nct hesitate to speak very plainly.

Senator Curtis of Kansas, says there must be found new sources of taxation.

He has found one, the billboards, the advertising signs along the highways, as ligitimate subjects for Federal taxation.

Instead of cutting down the taxes these senators, and perhaps others are planning to increase the taxes.

They want more money to spend. That is what they consider to be their mission to spend money, not to save it.

The man in Congess who advocates saving money is not considered to be a good politician.

But the people's attitude on this question is not the same as that of these distinguished men.

Progres has been made in putting business into the government eliminating the duplication of work, reducing th number of useless employees and practicing economics.

If the good work is continued as it has commenced, in a little time a reduction of taxes couid take place.

The majority of people think they are paying high enough taxes now.

They think they are getting too much government and that it is costing them too much. They want to see some plan carried out which will consider their pocket books a little and enable them to enjoy just as good government as they have today and pay less for it.

These are old fashioned notions but they exist and must be reckoned with.—Portland, Me., Press-Herald.

MAKE IT NATION WIDE

Daily we read of grade crossing accidents with the inevitable death list.

Warning devices, gates flag men and even approaching trains which are in plain sight fail to deter many drivers in their mad attempts to cross tracks without hesiaing a few seconds.

In their determination to eliminate railroad crossing accidents, the cities of north Chicago, Illinois and and Waukegan, Wisconsin have passed ordinances which provides that all vehicles, automobiles, trucks and other conveyances propelled by animal or other power and used in, and upon the streets and public high ways within the city limits, shall when approaching a railroad crossing, be brought to a full stop ten feet therefrom and the driver ascertain if the way is clear before proceeding to cross.

Penalty for violating the ordinance is a fine of not less than $5.00 or more than $200 for each offense. Similiar city ordinances or state laws throughout the country would reduce to a minimum the grade crossing death toll which runs between 10,000 and 15,000 persons annuolly.

Such a law which saves lives would be, instead of an expense to the taxpayers, a money-maker through fines collected for law breaking.

NEW USES FOR WOOD BEING REVEALED BY CHEMISTRY

Chemical research is revealing new uses for wood hat were not dreamed of a few years ago, declares the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculure. One example givenis that of the extended use of pulp wood not only for paper products but also for fiber containers, wall board, and similiar forms of mateial. Wood is aleady in use for the making of artificial silk, rope, carpets and other fabrics.

Because of this great progress in the discovey of new uses for wood, the department declares it to be all the more necessary to treat he country's forests as crop lands rather than timber mines with no thought of replacement.

STRIFE IN WEST INDIES WORRIES

Washington Hears of Troubles in Cuba, Haiti, Porto Rico and Virgin Islands.

CENSORSHIP DECREE IN CUBA

President Zayas Proceeds to Take "Silent and Efficacious" Means of Suppressing Demonstrations of Cuban Veterans Organizations.

Washington, Aug. 30.—Reports that Cuba is on the verge of a revolution which might impel the United States to intervene for the restoration of order and stable government under the terms of the Platt amendment were given additional significance here by the action of President Zayas in clamping a censorship on press dispatches from the island.

Official advices indicate that Zayas is proceeding to take "silent and efficacious" means of suppressing the demonstrations which for several days have been stirring the people to protest against his regime.

Other evidences of unrest in the Caribbean region added to the picture of Uncle Sam beset on all sides by his refractory wards.

Also Porto Rico and Haiti.

With the Filipinos more clamorously demanding independence word reached Washington that a commission, authorized by the legislature, has started for the capital to present pleas for the grant of a greater measure of self-government to Porto Rico.

Renewed agitation against the continued American occupation of Haiti is reported from Port au Prince since the arrival of Governor Russell to confer with the administration.

A warship recently was dispatched to Santo Domingo, from which the United States is getting ready to retire, but the navy department denied any significance to the move.

The Virgin islanders are again reported in a desperate plight as a result of their loss of commerce caused by the exclusion of ships having liquor aboard.

Reforms Asked by Zayas' Foes.

The demonstrations in Cuba which President Zayas has set out to suppress have been staged by the veterans of the Cuban army of liberation chiefly in support of the following program:

1. Opposition to the lottery bill, recently passed by the Cuban legislature.

2. Opposition to certain features of the Tarafa bill for the consolidation of the Cuban railways.

3. Demands for general improvement in government.

PLANS CUT IN TAXES

Chairman Madden Would Trim All Along Line.

Relief From Excess Burden on Living Costs Is the Aim of the Chicago Congressman—Sees Secretary Mellon.

Washington, Aug. 28.—Representative Martin B. Madden of Chicago, chairman of the house appropriations committee, announced after a conference with Secretary Mellon that he will ask congress at the December session to revise all income taxes downward.

At the same time it was learned that Secretary Mellon will ask congress to reduce the maximum surtax to about 25 per cent, half what it is at present.

Mr. Madden expressed the belief that past and prospective economies in the operation of the government will permit congress to make an immediate reduction in income taxes.

"My plan provides for reduction of the burden of taxes borne by all taxpayers," he said. "It is not limited to a paring of surtaxes. The main object is to afford relief to the taxpayers who have small incomes.

"Great governmental economies have been effected in the past two years. Deficits have been transformed into surpluses. The present revenue law was devised to provide the government with a far larger income than is now necessary or than will be necessary so long as the rule of retrenchment is followed."

RUSSIA CURED, SAYS HASKELL

Relief Work Chief, in Final Report, Declares Communism Abandoned.

CONVINCED OF U. S. GOOD WILL

Russ People Realize That American System Is Strong to Contain Spirit to Save Millions of Strangers From Starvation.

Washington, Aug. 29.—"Communism is dead and abandoned and Russia is on the road to recovery," declared Col. William N. Haskell, in charge of American relief work in Russia, in a final report to Secretary Hoover, chairman of the relief organization.

"The realization by the Russian people that the American system was strong and contained the spirit to save these millions of strangers from the death that had engulfed them must have furnished food for thought."

Colonel Haskell declared American aid during the last two years, which amounted to $60,000,000, had convinced the Russian people of the good will of the United States.

"During this period," said the report, "a little under a million tons of food, seed, clothing and medical supplies have been bought in the United States by the American relief administration, requiring about 250 voyages of American ships. These supplies amounted to 60,000 carloads on the Russian railways.

"Their distribution was accomplished through the organization of 35,000 different stations at the worst period when we were feeding nearly 11,000,000 men, women and children daily. Not only would these millions have died without this relief but even larger numbers would have perished from the cesspool of contagious disease.

"In the battle against these epidemics the relief administration furnished supplies to over 15,000 hospitals and institutions and organized the inoculation and vaccination of over 7,000,000 individuals. Its systematic campaign of sanitation stamped out the most dangerous center of contagion in the entire world.

"From seed imported about 8,000,000 acres of land were sown. The worst of the famine was over a year ago, but the relief administration has continued to feed, clothe and give medical service to an average of 2,000,000 derelict children until they were past danger and to provide food and clothing for over 100,000 teachers and professional people as a supplementary service.

"Through this service America has given impulse to the spiritual and economic recovery of a great nation, and on our own behalf we have created, in the assurance of good will from the Slav races, a great inheritance for our children."

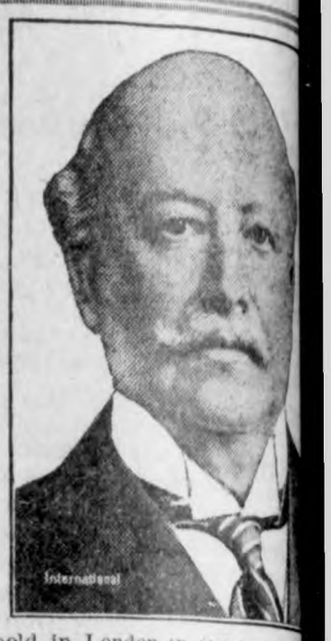
PROMINENT PEOPLE

West Indies' News Service Is America



Lord Burnham (portrait herewith) recently in the house of lords, broached the subject of the Americanization of the West Indies. According to present means, all the news published in West Indian newspapers is supplied by American news agencies. Discussion in the house of lords was held on the subject and the government was asked whether the West Indian colonies would be represented at the forthcoming imperial conference and whether the question of maritime and telegraphic communication with that part of the British empire would be considered.

England gets quite excited every now and then over the idea that the United States may get possession of the British West Indies. American statesmen have talked a good deal on the subject, their idea being that America should have them in order to protect the Panama canal.

The imperial conference is to be held in London in October. There three main subjects to come before the gathering—imperial defense, preference, and better means of perfecting communication between Great ain and the dominions. The dominions seem to regard the third subject great importance.

Rescue Ship Starts for Wrangel Isla

An expedition to rescue Allan Crawford of Toronto and his little band of British explorers who raised the British flag on Wrangel island in 1920, has sailed from Nome, Alaska, in the Donaldson, a refitted trading vessel, under command of Harold Noize (portrait herewith). The first stop is to be in Kotzebu sound, where a crack dog team will be obtained. From there a direct course to Wrangel island will be steered. If the Donaldson is blocked by ice, Mr. Noize plans to proceed with a party of four Eskimos over the ice pack to Wrangel island.

In 1921 Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who long had recognized the value of Wrangel island, an uninhabited island 75 miles long and 30 wide, lying 90 miles off the coast of Siberia, in the Arctic ocean, as a base for airplane and radio work as well as for fur trapping, sent a party of four white men to establish a colony upon the island and thereby reinstate British cl ownership. Crawford's companions are Loren Knight of McMinnville Frederick Maurer of New Philadelphia, O., and Milton Gall of New Br Tex.

A supply vessel in 1922, meeting massed ice floes about 100 mile Wrangel, returned to Nome. Another year has passed, with no new Wrangel.

MASQUE OF THE SEASONS

It was a picture illustrating the sasons. First there was spring. Beautiful nymphs played by a brook. Into its limpid waters they dipped their rosy toes. They were ligthly clad as befits spring. Next came summer. By the sea were more girls. Adown the sands they leaped and gamboled. They wore fewer clothes and the wind toyed with these scanty garments. Such was summer.

Maw got up at this point.

Dressmaking--

Ready-Made Coats and Dresses are made in clean, well lighted factories, comfortable places to work, well equipped with the latest and best labor saving machinery.

I talked to the Boss, of a large factory; he was a strong man, a capable fellow and hard working too. Why the cheap lining? Why the imitation buttons? Why don't you sew them on better? With all this wonderful equipment, why can't you give us a better dress than this for $20.00 wholesale?

But the Boss complained of his labor—they want short hours, war time wages, and then it takes an inspector for each table to watch over them.

Now Ladies, listen, don't buy a ready-made Garment until after you see us. Mrs. Blumer has charge of our Dressmaking Department, and she will give you better materials, better workmanship all for less money too, than the same ready made garment would cost you. And say, when Mrs. Blumer makes your Dress, it fits, don't have to alter it.

Progress of the Movement to "Put Farming on Par With Other Big Business."

A pamphlet and questionnaire on co-operative farm marketing recently issued by the State Bank Division, American Bankers Association, has brought out valuable information on the subject from bankers, farmers and state agricultural departments. It is being used as a campaign document in the organization of co-operative marketing associations in various sections of the country, farmers having adopted its slogan: "Put Agriculture on a Par with Other Big Business."

The movement on the part of farmers toward co-operative marketing as a cure for their present economic plight is nation-wide. There has been notable progress in the development of such associations, some conspicuously successful ones being in operation at the present time. There have also been some disastrous failures among these ventures in co-operative marketing, which is the inevitable accompaniment of the progress of any movement. The "Banker-Farmer," published by the American Bankers Association, says:

"Cause and effect are operative in co-operative marketing as truly as they are in every other business enterprise. An association will not necessarily succeed or fail merely because it is a co-operative association, but because it conforms to or transgresses from the underlying principles of successful business operation. The movement itself is of great national import and the bankers of the country can materially aid or retard its progress. The responsibility of leadership in rural communities rests very largely with the country banker. It is his duty to be informed on all matters relating to the farmers' well-being."

Modern conditions are such that agriculture cannot be successful by individual effort. To regain its position as a basic industry, and as a force in national affairs, agriculture must depend upon organization and co-operation for economic production, for economic marketing and for the establishment of its proper relationship in community life. — Howard Leonard, President, Illinois Agricultural Association.

EDISON-FORD PLAN'S ATTACK ON INTEREST

Abolition of Rent No More Plausible Than Abolition of Pay on Loans, Expert Shows.

It is no more unreasonable to pay interest on a loan of money than to pay rent on a house, declares William T. Foster, Director of the Pollack Foundation for Economic Research, in exposing the fallacy of the attack on interest charges by Henry Ford and Thomas A. Edison in their commodity money scheme to do away with the present financial system. Mr. Foster's argument is reviewed in the present article which is one of a series prepared by the American Bankers Association.

"The Ford-Edison commodity money plan is regarded as a step toward the abolition of all interest charges," Mr. Foster says. "'Interest,' says the Dearborn Independent, 'is a tax that few ancient tyrants would have dared impose. Interest in actual modern practice is a contrivance whereby all production is taxed by parasites, and whereby money is given a supremacy over men, material and management which it cannot sustain.'

Renting Money

"But is there really anything more terrible about paying for the use of money than about paying for the use of anything else? Suppose a farmer finds himself in need of a harvesting machine, and without enough money to buy one. In that case he can either borrow a machine of Neighbor Brown or borrow money and buy a machine. The farmer would consider it right to pay in some way for the use of the machine. Why should he expect to borrow money—which is honored in the markets in payment for the same machine—without paying for the use of the money?

"Now let us suppose that the farmer uses the machine so successfully that he saves a thousand dollars. With that money he can buy a farm and he can let Neighbor Brown have the use of it. Neighbor Brown naturally would expect to pay rent. Instead of buying the farm, however, he could lend the thousand dollars to his neighbor in order that his neighbor might buy the farm. In that case Neighbor Brown should expect to pay for the rent of the money. All this seems clear. When the transactions are as simple as these it is plain that there is just as great propriety in charging for the use of money as in charging for the use of things that money will buy.

Loaned Money Builds a School

"We may assume, however, that the farmer does not want to buy land and Neighbor Brown does not want to borrow money. In that case the farmer deposits his thousand dollars in a bank and the bank pays him interest for the use of his money. But the bank can pay interest only if it makes profitable use of his money. Now the bank finds that the city needs a high-school building, and has decided to borrow enough money to construct it. In order to obtain the money the city has issued bonds, each of which is a promise to pay one thousand dollars at a specified date, and interest in the meantime at a specified rate. The bank buys one of these bonds. Thus the farmer has had a part in providing the city with a school building; and the farmer has just as much right to expect interest for the use of his money as though he had loaned the money directly or indirectly to Neighbor Brown."

"CAPITALISTS"—AND DON'T KNOW IT

A good many people who rail against capital are beating their own backs. Some are savings bank depositors; some have shares in building and loan associations; some have bought a liberty bond; some have ordered a stock of goods for their store. All of them, without knowing it, have performed a great miracle, for they have turned the work of their hands or their brains into a new product which, while it helps them, is helping thousands of others. Every one of them is a capitalist as most of us are—unless we are tramps or paupers or ne'er-do-wells—and we may well be proud of the name. For capitalism, instead of being the devilish invention of a few selfish interests, is the great material force that has lifted millions from poverty, degradation and slavery.

Like other human institutions, capital can be abused. So, too, can eyesight and health and education and love. Part of America's great job is to remedy and prevent such abuses. Sane people, however, do not cut off their feet to get rid of their corns.

Capital is today's surplus. It is what gives us a better start tomorrow than we had today. If we don't save it, we don't have it, and when we have it, it is useless until it is put to work.

If thrift is right, then it is right that people should acquire funds as the result of their industry and self-denial. But money that is merely hoarded is like water that becomes stagnant; it is harmful, not helpful. When money is put to work, it is like water power; it turns the wheels of industry, increases employment and raises the general level of comfort.

When every producer can create a surplus and that surplus can be gathered into a common fund and put to work for the common good we shall have reached an ideal condition.—From "The Greatest Family in the World."

THE FARMER'S NEW POSITION

By WALTER W. HEAD,

First Vice-President American Bankers Association

The farmer today is more than a tiller of the soil. He is a business man. Raising crops is only a part of his business, if he is a real up-to-date Twentieth Century farmer. Problems of marketing, distribution and financing are equally important.

Walter W. Head

The complexity of our modern economic organization makes it necessary for the farmer to understand and assist in solving these problems if he is to succeed. In this new role—as a business man—the farmer steadily has advanced to a better position.

There was a time when the farmer was dependent wholly upon private marketing agencies, whose interest was not always identical with his own, whose greed for profits sometimes outmatched consideration of the farmer's need. Today there are many great co-operative marketing organizations that handle a large part of the farmer's crop and win for him more liberal treatment from the private agencies which still handle the bulk of his production.

Today the farmer also has his own co-operative agencies of credit. If not satisfied with the terms upon which his local capitalist is willing to advance money upon a land mortgage, the farmer can go directly to the Federal Land Bank, which, by reason of tax-exemption and other advantages incidental to its governmental character, can loan money at a rock-bottom rate of interest.

In addition, the federal government has established another group of banks which permit the local bankers—by rediscount privileges—to extend the farmer credit for his current operations on a more favorable basis than ever before. If he thinks his local bank is not sufficiently responsive to his need, this same legislation enables him to join with other farmers in a co-operative marketing association and arrange for credit direct from the government banks.

New Credit Facilities

For years it has been the farmer's complaint—with considerable justification—that he, alone of all producers, has been forced to market his crop on the buyer's terms because of his inability to use his products, in storage, as a basis for credit. Today the agricultural credits act authorizes the acceptance of warehouse receipts, on non-perishable agricultural products, as collateral for loans, the same as in the case of sugar or other commodities of commerce.

These developments have relieved the farmer from what seemed to be persecution by short-sighted, tight-fisted, grasping grain dealers, landlords and bankers—for there were some bankers who were guilty of this very thing, who thought of the farmer principally as a weak and ignorant opponent in a game whose only stake was the collection of a high rate of interest. The farmer's suspicion of the banker arose because of misunderstanding, because he judged bankers as a class by the derelictions of a few. Today, with these sources of government-controlled credit available at his call, the farmer cannot charge or even suspect that the bankers are conspiring to do him harm.

As the real farmer has taken advantage of these opportunities, he has made himself a business man. Like other successful business men, he is equipped with credit to finance his operations, he is able to make use of labor-saving machinery, he is able to barter with buyers of his products as their equal.

COMPULSORY THRIFT

In Kansas a group of power and telephone companies is trying a compulsory thrift plan, which affects about 1,200 employees and applies to every member of the organization from the president to the humblest day laborer. The plan requires that each shall save and invest monthly at least 10 per cent of his income.

Every month each employee must make a report to the general office of how much he has saved, and in what he has invested it. The investment must be approved by a committee competent to advise. Government securities, savings bank accounts, building and loan stock, payment on a home, even payments on furniture are allowed. If debts have been incurred, these must be listed and payments may be arranged on them, but no more are to be assumed. The idea is to make the employee live within his means and also lay aside something in a definite form.

Reports for the first nine months show that about 13 per cent of the wages have been saved, no single employee falling below 10 per cent. This amounts to over $100,000. Failure to report or to save brings dismissal, but in only two instances among the 1,200 employees was such action needed. Budget books are distributed and their use explained as a helpful method in establishing a working scale of living that will allow for thrift.

His white face loomed over hers. She closed her eyes. He rained kisses upon her face, but no more upon her mouth. On her closed eyes, her hair, her cheeks, her neck he pressed swift kisses—lips that lost their fire and grew cold. Then he released her, and, lifting and righting her in the saddle, he still held her arm to keep her from falling.

For a moment Madeline sat on her horse with shut eyes. She dreaded the light.

"Now you can't say you've never been kissed," Stewart said. His voice seemed a long way off. "But that was coming to you, so be game. Here!"

She felt something hard and cold and metallic thrust into her hand. He made her fingers close over it, hold it. The feel of the thing revived her. She opened her eyes. Stewart had given her his gun. He stood with his broad chest against her knee, and she looked up to see that old mocking smile on his face.

"Go ahead! Throw my gun on me! You're a thoroughbred!"

Madeline did not yet grasp his meaning.

"You can put me down in that quiet place on the hill—beside Monty Price."

Madeline dropped the gun with a shuddering cry of horror. The sense of his words, the memory of Monty,

"Now You Can't Say You've Never Been Kissed," Stewart Said.

the certainty that she would kill Stewart if she held the gun an instant longer, tortured the self-accusing cry from her.

Stewart stooped to pick up the weapon.

"You might have saved me a h—l of a lot of trouble," he said, with another flash of the mocking smile. "You're beautiful and sweet and proud, but you're no thoroughbred! Majesty Hammond, adios!"

Stewart leaped for the saddle of his horse, and with the flying mount crashed through the mesquites to disappear.

CHAPTER XX

The Secret Told.

Late in the night Madeline fell asleep. In the morning she was pale and languid, but in a mental condition that promised composure.

It was considerably after her regular hour that Madeline repaired to her office. The door was open, and just outside, tipped back in a chair, sat Stillwell.

"Mawnin', Miss Majesty," he said, as he rose to greet her with his usual courtesy. Madeline shrank inwardly, fearing his old lamentations about Stewart. Then she saw a dusty, ragged pony in the yard and a little burro drooping under a heavy pack. Both animals bore evidence of long, arduous travel.

"To whom do they belong?" asked Madeline.

"Them critters? Why, Danny Mains," replied Stillwell, with a cough that betrayed embarrassment.

"Is Danny Mains here?" she asked, in sudden curiosity.

The old cattleman nodded gloomily.

"Yep, he's hyar, all right. Sloped in from the hills an' he hollered to see Bonita. He's locoed, too, about that little black-eyed hussy. Why, he hardly said, 'Howdy, Bill,' before he began to ask wild an' eager questions. I took him in to see Bonita. He's been there more'n a half-hour now."

Rapid footsteps with an accompaniment of clinking spurs sounded in the hallway. Then a young man ran out upon the porch. He was a handsome, frank-faced boy. At sight of Madeline he slammed down his sombrero and, leaping at her, he possessed himself of her hands. His swift violence not only alarmed her, but painfully reminded her of something she wished to forget.

This cowboy bent his head and kissed her hands and wrung them, and when he straightened up he was crying.

"Miss Hammond, she's safe an' almost well, an' what I feared most ain't so, thank God," he cried. "Sure I'll never be able to pay you for all you've done for her. She's told me how she was dragged down here, how Gene tried to save her, how you spoke up for Gene an' her, too, how Monty at the last throwed his guns. Poor Monty! We were good friends, Monty an' I. There's Nels an' Nick an' Gene, he's been some friend to me; but Monty Price was—he was grand. He never knew, any more than you or Bill, here, or the boys, what Bonita was to me."

Stillwell's kind and heavy hand fell upon the cowboy's shoulder.

"Danny, what's all this queer gab?" he asked. "An' you're takin' some liberty with Miss Hammond, who never seen you before. I see you're not drinkin'. Come, ease up now an' talk sense."

The cowboy's fine, frank face broke into a smile. He dashed the tears from his eyes. Then he laughed. His laugh had a pleasant, boyish ring—a happy ring.

"Bill, old pal, stand bridle down a minute, will you?" Then he bowed to Madeline. "I beg your pardon, Miss Hammond, for seemin' rudeness. I'm Danny Mains. An' Bonita is my wife. I'm so crazy glad she's safe an' unharmed—so grateful to you that—why, sure it's a wonder I didn't kiss you outright."

"Bonita's your wife!" ejaculated Stillwell.

"Sure. We've been married for months," replied Danny, happily. "Gene Stewart did it. Good old Gene. I guess maybe I haven't come to pay him up for all he's done for me! You see, I've been in love with Bonita for two years. An' Gene—you know, Bill, what a way Gene has with girls—he was—well, he was tryin' to get Bonita to have me."

Madeline's quick, varying emotions were swallowed up in a boundless gladness. Something dark, deep, heavy, and somber was flooded from her heart. She had a sudden rich sense of gratitude toward this smiling, clean-faced cowboy whose blue eyes flashed through tears.

"Danny Mains!" she said, tremulously and smilingly. "If you are as glad as your news has made me—if you really think I merit such a reward—you may kiss me outright."

With a bashful wonder, but with right hearty will, Danny Mains availed himself of this gracious privilege.

Stillwell snorted. The signs of his phenomenal smile were manifest, otherwise Madeline would have thought that snort an indication of furious disapproval.

"Bill, straddle a chair," said Danny. "You've gone back a heap these last few months, frettin' over your bad boys, Danny an' Gene. You'll need support under you while I'm throwin' my yarn. Story of my life, Bill." He placed a chair for Madeline. "Miss Hammond, beggin' your pardon again, I want you to listen, also. You've the face an' eyes of a woman who loves to hear of other people's happiness. Besides, somehow, it's easy for me to talk lookin' at you."

Walking off the porch, he stood before the weary horse and burro. With the swift violence characteristic of men of his class he slipped the pack from the burro and threw saddle and bridle from the horse.

He untied the pack and, taking a small, heavy sack from it, he came back upon the porch. Deliberately he dumped the contents of the sack at Stillwell's feet. Piece after piece of rock thumped upon the floor. The pieces were sharp, ragged, evidently broken from a ledge; the body of them was white in color, with yellow veins and bars and streaks. Stillwell grasped up one rock after another, stared and stuttered, put the rocks to his lips, dug into them with his shaking fingers; then he lay back in his chair, head against the wall, and as he gaped at Danny the old smile began to transform his face.

Danny regarded Stillwell with lofty condescension. "Now, Bill, what've we got here, say, offhand?"

"Oh, Lord, Danny! I'm afraid to say. Look, Miss Majesty, jest look at the gold. I've lived among prospectors an' gold mines fer thirty years, an' I never seen the beat of this."

"The Lost Mine of the Padres!" cried Danny, in stentorian voice. "An' it belongs to me!"

Stillwell made some incoherent sound as he sat up fascinated, quite beside himself.

"Bill, it was some long time ago since you saw me," said Danny. "Fact is, I know how you felt, because Gene kept me posted. I happened to run across Bonita, an' I wasn't goin' to let her ride away alone, when she told me she was in trouble. We hit the trail for the Peloncillos. Bonita had Gene's horse, an' she was to meet him up on the trail. We got to the mountains all right, an' nearly starved for a few days till Gene found us. He had got in trouble himself an' couldn't fetch much with him.

"We made for the crags an' built a cabin. I come down that day Gene sent his horse Majesty to you. Never saw Gene so broken-hearted. Well, after he sloped for the border Bonita an' I were hard put to it to keep alive. But we got along, an' I think it was then she began to care a little for me. Once I went to El Cajon an' run plumb into Gene. He was back from the revolution an' cuttin' up some. But I got away from him after doin' all I could to drag him out of town. A long time after that Gene trailed up to the crags an' found us. Gene had stopped drinkin', he'd changed wonderful, was fine an' dandy. It was then he began to pester the life out of me to make me marry Bonita. I was happy, so was she, an' I was some scared of spoilin' it. Gene's dog-gone hard to buck against! I had to give in, an' I asked Bonita to marry me. Well, she wouldn't at first—said she wasn't good enough for me. But I saw the marriage idea was workin' deep, an' I just kept on bein' as decent as I knew how. So it was my wantin' to marry Bonita—my bein' glad to marry her—that made her grow soft an' sweet an' pretty as—as a mountain quail. Gene fetched up Padre Marcos, an' he married us."

Danny paused in his narrative, breathing hard, as if the memory of the incident described had stirred strong and thrilling feeling in him. Stillwell's smile was rapturous. Madeline leaned toward Danny with her eyes shining.

"Miss Hammond, an' you, Bill Stillwell, now listen, for this is strange I've got to tell you. The afternoon Bonita an' I were married, when Gene an' the padre had gone, she left me for a little, an' when she came back she wore some pretty yellow flowers in her hair. She said some queer things about spirits rollin' rocks down the canyon. Then she said she wanted to show me where she always sat an' waited an' watched for me when I was away. She led me around under the crags to a long slope. It was some pretty there—clear an' open, with a long sweep, an' the desert yawnin' deep an' red. There were yellow flowers on that slope, the same kind she had in her hair.

"When I heard the strange crack of rollin' rocks—heard them rattle down an' roll an' grow faint—I was some out of my head. But not for long. Them rocks were rollin' all right, only it was the weatherin' of the cliffs.

"An' there under the crags was a gold pocket.

"Then I was worse than locoed. I went gold-crazy. I worked like seventeen burros. Bill, I dug a lot of gold-bearin' quartz. Bonita watched the trails for me, brought me water. That was how she come to get caught by Pat Hawe an' his guerrillas. Sure! Pat Hawe was so set on doin' Gene dirt that he mixed up with Don Carlos. Bonita will tell you some staggerin' news about that outfit. Just now my story is all gold."

Danny Mains got up and kicked back his chair. Blue lightning gleamed from his eyes as he thrust a hand toward Stillwell.

"Bill, old pal, put her there—give me your hand," he said. "You were always my friend. You had faith in me. Well, Danny Mains owes you, an' he owes Gene Stewart a good deal, an' Danny Mains pays. I want two pardners to help me work my gold mine. You an' Gene. Go fetch him; an' right here in this house, with my wife an' Miss Hammond as witnesses, we'll draw up a pardnership. Go find him, Bill. I want to show him this gold, show him how Danny Mains pays! An' the only bitter drop in my cup today is that I can't ever pay Monty Price."

Madeline watched the huge Stillwell and the little cowboy, both talking wildly, as they walked off arm in arm to find Stewart. She imagined something of what Danny's disappointment would be, of the elder man's consternation and grief, when he learned Stewart had left for the border. At this juncture she looked up to see a strange, yet familiar figure approaching. Padre Marcos!

Mention of Padre Marcos, sight of him, had always occasioned Madeline a little indefinable shock; and now, as he stepped to the porch, a shrunken, stooped, and sad-faced man, she was startled.

The padre bowed low to her.

"Senora, will you grant me audience? It is a matter of great moment, which you might not care to have any one hear."

Wonderingly Madeline inclined her head. The padre gently closed one door and then the others.

"Senora, I have come to disclose a secret—my own sinfulness in keeping it—and to implore your pardon. Do you remember that night Senor Stewart dragged me before you in the waiting-room at El Cajon?"

"Yes," replied Madeline.

"Senora, since that night you have been Senor Stewart's wife!"

Madeline became as motionless as stone. She seemed to feel nothing, only to hear.

"You are Senor Stewart's wife. I have kept the secret under fear of death. But I could keep it no longer. Senor Stewart may kill me now. Ah, Senora, it is very strange to you. You were so frightened that night, you knew not what happened. Senor Stewart threatened me. He forced you. He made me speak the service. He made you speak the Spanish yes. And I, Senora, knowing the deeds of these sinful cowboys, fearing worse than disgrace to one so beautiful and so good as you, I could not do less than marry you truly. At least you should be his wife. So I married you, truly, in the service of my church."

"My God!" cried Madeline, rising.

"Hear me! I implore you, Senora, hear me out! Do not leave me! Do not look so—so— Ah, Senora, let me speak a word for Senor Stewart. He was drunk that night. He did not know what he was about. In the morning he came to me, made me swear by my cross that I would not reveal the disgrace he had put upon you. If I did he would kill me. Life is nothing to the American vaquero, Senora. I promised to respect his command, but I did not tell him you were his wife. He did not dream I had truly married you. He went to fight for the freedom of my country—Senora, he is one splendid soldier—and I brooded over the sin of my secret. If he were killed I need never tell you. But if he lived I knew that I must some day.

"Senora, I pray you, do not misunderstand my mission. Beyond my confession to you I have only a duty to tell you of the man whose wife you are. But I am a priest and I can read the soul. The ways of God are inscrutable. I am only a humble instrument. You are a noble woman, and Senor Stewart is a man of desert iron forged anew in the crucible of love. Quien sabe? Senor Stewart swore he would kill me if I betrayed him. But he will not lift his hand against me. For the man bears you a very great and pure love, and it has changed him. To love you above the spirit of the flesh; to know you are his wife, his, never to be another's except by his sacrifice; to watch you with a secret glory of joy and pride; to stand, while he might, between you and evil; to find his happiness in service; to wait, with never a dream of telling you, for the hour to come when to leave you free he must go out and get himself shot! Senora, that is beautiful, it is sublime, it is terrible. It has brought me to you with my confession. So I beseech you in my humble office as priest, as a lover of mankind, before you send Stewart to his death, to be sure there is here no mysterious dispensation of God. I pray you, Senora, before you let Stewart give you freedom at such cost be sure you do not want his love, lest you cast away something sweet and ennobling which you yourself have created."

CHAPTER XXI

News of Stewart.

Blinded, like a wild creature, Madeline Hammond ran to her room. She felt as if a stroke of lightning had shattered the shadowy substance of the dream she had made of real life. The wonder of Danny Mains' story, the strange regret with which she had realized her injustice to Stewart, the astounding secret as revealed by Padre Marcos—these were forgotten in the sudden consciousness of her own love. She liberated the thought that knocked at the gates of her mind. With quivering lips she whispered it. Then she spoke aloud:

"I will say it—hear it. I—I love him!"

In a nature like hers, where strength of feeling had long been inhibited as a matter of training, such a transforming surprise as sudden consciousness of passionate love required time for its awakening, time for its sway.

By and by that last enlightening moment come, and Madeline Hammond faced not only the love in her heart, but the thought of the man she loved.

Suddenly, as she raged, something in her—this dauntless new personality—took arms against indictment of Gene Stewart. Her mind whirled about him and his life. She saw him drunk, brutal; she saw him abandoned, lost. Then out of the picture she had of him thus slowly grew one of a different man—weak, sick, changed by shock, growing strong, strangely, spiritually altered, silent, lonely like an eagle, secretive, tireless, faithful, soft as a woman, hard as iron to endure, and at the last noble.

"Oh, it is all terrible!" she cried. "I am his wife. His wife! That meeting with him—the marriage—then his fall, his love, his rise, his silence, his pride! And I can never be anything to him. Could I be anything to him? I, Madeline Hammond? But I am his wife, and I love him! His wife! I am the wife of a cowboy! That might be undone. Can my love be undone? Ah, do I want anything undone? He is gone. Gone! Could he have meant—I will not, dare not think of that. He will come back. No, he never will come back. Oh, what shall I do?"

* * * * * * *

And on the morning of the next day, when Madeline went out upon the porch, Stillwell, haggard and stern, with husky, incoherent word, handed her a message from El Cajon. She read:

"El Capitan Stewart captured by rebel soldiers in fight at Agua Prieta yesterday. He was a sharpshooter in the federal ranks. Sentenced to death Thursday at sunset."

CHAPTER XXII

The Ride.

"Stillwell!"

The old cattleman stood mute before her, staring at her white face, at her eyes of flame.

"Stillwell! I am Stewart's wife!"

"My Gawd, Miss Majesty!" he burst out. "I knowed somethin' turrible was wrong. Aw, sure it's a pity—"

"Do you think I'll let him be shot when I know him now, when I'm no longer blind, when I love him?" she asked, with passionate swiftness. "I will save him. This is Wednesday morning. I have thirty-six hours to save his life. Stillwell, send for Link and the car!"

She went into her office. Her mind worked with extraordinary rapidity and clearness. Her plan, born in one lightninglike flash of thought, necessitated the careful wording of telegrams to Washington, to New York, to San Antonio. These were to senators, representatives, men high in public and private life, men who would remember her and who would serve her to their utmost. Never before had her position meant anything to her comparable with what it meant now. Never in all her life had money seemed the power that it was then. If she had been poor! A shuddering chill froze the thought at its inception. She dispelled heartbreaking thoughts. She had power. She had wealth. She would set into operation all the unlimited means these gave her—the wires and pulleys and strings underneath the surface of political and international life, the open, free, purchasing value of money or the deep, underground, mysterious, incalculably powerful influence moved by gold. She could save Stewart.

When she went outside the car was there with Link, helmet in hand, a cool, bright gleam in his eyes, and with Stillwell, losing his haggard misery, beginning to respond to Madeline's spirit.

"Link, drive Stillwell to El Cajon in time for him to catch the El Paso train," she said. "Wait there for his return ,and if any message comes from him, telephone it at once to me."

Then she gave Stillwell the telegrams to send from El Cajon and drafts to cash in El Paso. She instructed him to go before the rebel junta, then stationed at Juarez, to explain the situation, to bid them expect communications from Washington officials requesting and advising Stewart's exchange as a prisoner of war, to offer to buy his release from the rebel authorities.

There was a crack, a muffled sound bursting into a roar, and the big car jerked forward to bound over the edge of the slope, to leap down the long incline, to shoot out upon the level valley floor and disappear in moving dust.

Madeline endured patiently, endured for long interminable hours while holding to hope with indomitable will.

No message came. At sunset she went outdoors, suffering a torment of accumulating suspense. Night fell. She prayed for the sun not to rise, not to begin its short twelve-hour journey toward what might be a fatal setting for Stewart. But the dawn did lighten, swiftly she thought, remorselessly. Daylight had broken, and this was Thursday!

Sharp ringing at the telephone bell startled her, roused her into action. She ran to answer the call.

"Hello—hello—Miss Majesty!" came the hurried reply. "This 's Link talkin'. Messages for you. Favorable, the operator said. I'm to ride out with them. I'll come a-hummin'."

That was all. Madeline heard the bang of the receiver as Stevens threw it down. Favorable! Then Stillwell had been successful. Her heart leaped

"I Will Say It—Hear It—I—I Love Him!"

Suddenly she became weak and her hands failed of their accustomed deftness. It took her what seemed a thousand years to dress. Breakfast meant nothing to her except that it helped her to pass dragging minutes.

Finally a low hum, mounting swiftly to a roar and ending with a sharp report, announced the arrival of the car. If her feet had kept pace with her heart she would have raced out to meet Link.

LEADER OF OVERSEAS BODY

Miss Louise Wells of Chicago Is Re-Elected President of Women's Service League.

Miss Louise Wells of Chicago has been re-elected president of the Women's Overseas Service league, known as the little sister of the American Legion because many Legion women are also members of the league, making for closer co-operation between the two organizations.

Members of the league were the Army and Red Cross nurses, Salvation Army lassies, the "Y" girls, signal corps girls, canteeners, librarians and entertainers who served America's fighting men in France. Many were gassed and wounded and more than 150 of them died of such plagues as trench fever and influenza. A few were killed in action.

Miss Wells entered the service from Los Angeles. She is the daughter of Arthur G. Wells, vice president of the Santa Fe railroad. After serving at Camp Upton, she went overseas as a canteen worker. At Glenoble, at Allevard-Les-Bains and at Lyon, she served as a canteen worker and with the entertainment forces. She organized the Los Angeles unit of the league, and later was president of the Chicago unit.

Speaking at a recent convention of the league, Brig. Gen. Charles D. Dawes said:

"You never looked so good to me as you did in your somber uniforms and hats, wading through the mud and mire, tramping through the rain, serving hot chocolate for hours at a time, in that country which, before we went over, we called 'sunny France.'"

Respects of the American Legion were paid to the overseas women by Past National Commander John G. Emery of Grand Rapids, Mich.

TO HONOR WORLD WAR HERO

Arkansas Legion Members Plan Fitting Tributes to Ex-Service Man in Unmarked Grave.

Arkansas members of the American Legion are assisting in plans for the Herman Davis Memorial Foundation in honor of Herman Davis, Arkansas' outstanding hero of the World war, who died in January from the effects of gas and is buried in an unmarked grave at Manila, Ark.

Plans of the foundation call for the erection of a suitable monument to his memory at Manila, and a similar monument on the lawn of the State War Memorial building at Little Rock. In addition, a scholarship will be endowed at the University of Arkansas, to be known as the Herman Davis scholarship.

A highway leading through the northern part of Mississippi county, through Manila and past the burial place of the young hero will be known as the Herman Davis Memorial highway.

Placed fourth on the list of 100 heroes of the war by General Pershing, Davis was always modest and reticent. He did not seek to capitalize his fame, but when the war was over returned to his native soil and again took up the ways of the simple life which he always had led.

SAYS LEGION BENEFITS TOWN

Disabled Veteran Declares Organization Demands Justice for Every Ex-Service Man.

"We knew it would be a benefit to the town to get a post of the American Legion here. The Legion deserves all the assistance that every ex-service man can give it, for I, as a disabled man, know that through that organization a disabled man can get justice."

This was the declaration of Frederick Graham, a veteran of the World war and of the Spanish-American war, who now resides in Edmonds, Wash. The town has no post of the American Lgeion, owing to a small number of ex-service men, and Graham has been suggested as one to start such a movement among the former soldiers in the community.

Graham wrote national headquarters of the Legion that he was unable to take up the organization work on account of his physical condition. He said that he was being cared for by the veterans' bureau, after his case had been presented by American Legion officials.

Put On a Paint That Stays Put

Hold on a minute, and say this to yourself before you put another cent into paint. Say that it costs just as much to put on a poor paint as a good one. Generally more.

A poor paint doesn't stay put. Doesn't, because you can't get out of anything what isn't in it. We have proven to our entire satisfaction that Lowe Brothers put stay-putness in every gallon of paint they make.

Stay-put is just another way of saying it stands weather's wear and tear. Drop in and we will show you a color card and tell you some paint facts, which, have a notion you have never been told.

KLEMME SCHOOLS OPEN WITH LARGE ENROLLMENT

HIGH SCHOOL HAS AN ENROLLMENT OF SIXTY- FOUR

Freshmann Class Alone Has An Enrollment of Twenty-Eight

The Klemme schools opened for regular work last Thursday afternoon, and at the present time is progressing smoothly

The entire school has an enrollment greatly increased over pervious years, but the High School has the most noticeable gains.

The Freshman class this year has twenty-eight pupils. Of this number nineteen are from the rural districts. This shows that the rural people are beginning to realize more and more the advantages of good education. The Sophomore class is also increasd having a total of nineteen.

The Juniors have eleven in their clas and the Seniors have six. This is quite a large class for the first year that Klemme has had a four year High School and we can well feel proud of it.

Another thing that our High School can feel proud of is the efficient teaching staff.

Miss Stacey, principle has charge of all English classes, Miss Scharlach teaches Latin, General Science, Physical Geography and Home Economics; Mr. Tregilgus has all Mathmetics, Commercial Geography and Music, and Professor Neese has Physics Manual Training and Agricultur.

All the seats have not yet arrived for the High School assembly, but recitation chairs are being used until the desks arrive.

Profesor Neese has laid down the principles upon which the school government will be baced.—The Moral side on the ten Commandments, the Civil side upon 14 points or Duties of a Good Citizen. We will list these points.

1. Kindness
2. Helpfulness
3. Industry
4. Self-Respect.
5. Usefulness
6. Co-Operation.
7. Loyalty
8. Self Control
9. Cleanliness
10. Punctuality
11. Honesty.
12. Courtesy
13. Obedience
14. Perseverence.

The things that all students are asked to do are: "Come to School; Be a Lady and a Gentleman; Make your grade."

We thin& Mr. Neeso has worked out a very good law; and if followed there will be very little difficulties in our school life.

BASEBALL

Under Coach Tregilgus the Baseball squad is working diligently to have one of the best ball teams in the history of the school. Around seventeen boys have signed up for baseball, which gives a goodly number to pick the team. Last week the squad worked on the ball diamond and it is now in fairly good shape. Last Friday a practice game was played with a pick-up team from around town. The game was not exactly a sucess for the High School team, although they won by a score of 9 to8. The game seemed to lack the pep it should have had, and many errors were made. However with practice these faults can be corrected and we hope before long Klemme will have a strong 9.

Coach Tregilgus has not assigned any places on the team as yet and probably will not until he has seen more of the work of the individuals. About the same line-up as was used last year was played Friday.

No one can participate in athletics unless they have an average of all their classes of 77% and a standing deportment of 90%.

Following is the probable schedule which will be played by the K. H. S. this fall.

Domestic Science

The girls in Domestic Science are learning to wash dishes. We eanrestly hope they don't break any.

.From a Frshman

Klemme High School boasts of 27 Freshman. They seem to act very peculiar, we wonder why the odd actions? Is it because of the newness of the school room or are they trying to act as grown ups as they are now in the High School?

Don't "kid" the Freshman, because they feel too green.

(Editors Note: Of course we wouldn't do such a thing!)

High School Sees Eclipse Monday

At 2:30 Monday afternoon the High Shcool was dismissed for ten minutes to watch the eclipse of the sun. Smoked glasses were handed a round so that every one was able to see. After all were in the Assembly again, Miss Stacey conducted a short class in astromony. She told of her experience in looking throuhh a large telescope.

The eclipse will be seen partially throughout the United States and some South American countries.

Starting at about 2:14 the eclipse lasted until 4:00. The sun was 52% covered.

..Astromoners will put their powerful telescopes in the path of the total eclipse which passes southern California and Mexico and make observations. Photographs will be made of the Corona and the prominences; also of the stars around the sun. These, it is thought will help prove the "Einstein effect."

There is little danger of unfavorable weather conditions, because in Mexico, clouds in the early afternoon are uncommon.

The total duration of the eclipse at the island of San Clement which is off th west coast of an Diego will be 215 seconds or 3 minutes, 35 seconds.

20,000 SHIPS THRU CANAL

Panama Canal Gets Enormous Revenue in Nine Years

Washington, D. C., More than 20,000 vessels carrying an aggregate cargo of 84,000,000 tons and paying tolls of more than $76,500,000 have passed through the Panama canal in the nine years of its operation ending August 14th.

According to reports received, in the first year of its operation, the canal was used by 1,311 vesels with a cargo tonnage of 5,861,785 and tolls amounted to $5,171,000 compared with 4,272 vesels with a cargo tonnage of 21,210,00 and tolls of $18,975,000 for last year.

$1,000,000 A WEEK FOR CHEWING GUM

The people a United States spend upwards of one million dollars a week for their chewing gum, and the habit is still growing.

The value of the product turned out of the factories of America is a little more than double that of prewar year 1914, which was the first year the Government condescended to notice the chewing gum industry.

The girls of this and other towns when hey sat in the movie and chewed their gum while the favorite star made love in alluring fashion, little dreamed the effect they were having on the prosperity of their country. Dignified England laughed a her, and deplorable chewing habit," but while the sedate Briton was consciously in the mood of derision he was unconsiously falling by the wayside. The year 1920 saw the British flapper really the original of the species, consuming American gum to the tune of $1,120,000 whole sale value. And so the story runs. France in the same year took $383,000 worth, and other European countries consumed proportionate quanties. Only the consumption of Germany was small, the total figure being $260. The amount of the capital invested shows beyond doubt that the habit has come to say. Perhaps no indusry has shown a more remarkable improvement. Certainly no industry represents a more potent argumen to prove the telling effect of advertising.

A 15 year old girl of Detroit has written these slogans for autoists.

"Drive right and more pedestrians will be left".

"Watch your 'step on it' ".

'Taking the other fellow's dust is better than 'to dust returneh'.

"Six feet have awaited many a driver who wouldn't give an inch."

JUMPS 75 FOOT BANK

Car Goes Over Bank Into Creek And No One Hurt

Mountain Lake, Minn. —To go off the road plunge through a fence and down a seventq-five foot embankment into a creek with out seriously injuring one of its seven passengers, was a feat performed by a big car driven by Benard Rinehart, of Trinity, Kentucky, on a highway near here.

The machine did not turn over as it went down the grade and this accounts for the fact that none of the occupants of the car were injured, all remaining in their seats until the car came to a full stop in the creek.

New Klemme Pastor Was Popular At Garner

REV. GAUGER WILL HAVE THREE CONGREGATIONS

Garner Leader Praises New Klemme Minister

It is seldom that one can extend congratulations and at he same time express words of condolence to a people on the same subject at the same time, but we have at hand subject matter where this is possible. The people of Grace Methodist church are to be congratulated upon having been able to keep Rev. A. W. Gauger as their pastor for a seven-year period, and words of condolence are in order for the reason that at the Northwest German Conference which was held at Fenton, August 28th to September 2nd Rev. Gauger was assigned to the town of Klemme where he will serve a united congregation. At Klemme, the same as has been accomplished here, the two Methodist churches have united, and it is as pastor of this united congregation that Rev. Gauger was called. We do not know that the people of Klemme realize what the annexing of Rev. Gauger and his family will mean to that town, but we of Garner do. We do not speak as one of his parishioners nor one of the Methodist faith, but as a citizen of Garner—a by-stander who has had opportunity to observe the work of Rev. Gauger. Without exception he is he most earnest, most sincere Christian man we have ever known, and any town or community will gather noble inspiration from his presece. During the seven years of his ministory in Garner there has, at all times, been complete accord between Rev. Gauger and his people. He is by no means of a conciliatory nature, but broad-minded and before taking a final stand in any matter, looks well to both sides of the matter under consideration. He is public-spirited, a real booster for his town, and Garner will miss him. His wife and family will be ornaments to the society of Klemme. If this old world were only filled with people like Rev. Gauger and his family, what a perfect condition we would have.
—Garner Leader.

A STORY OF OLD NEW ORLEANS

The Hero of "Captain Sazarac" the fascinating historical romance which we have secured for the readers of our paper is Jean Lafitte that mysterious and picturesque character who figured so strongly in the early days of New Orleans. Some chroniclers have stated that Lafitte was perhaps the boldest blood-letter who ever scuttled a ship or ransacked a fat Indiaman while others have told us that he was a charming fellow much given to deeds of valor and to sympathizing with the distress of kidnapped ladies.

In th hands of Charls Tenny Jacknon, author of "Captain Sazaraac," Lafitte is a very noble figure of a pirate. In fact he is similiar in many manys to the sort of pirate many of us had privately planned to become a few decades ago but for the lack of parental co-operation might have indeed have attempted.

Lafite had just taken young Bowie into the west; the plots of Aaron Burr and Wilkinson to found a Miss issippi empire had come to wreck; Monroe's famous doctrine had only begun to function; John Wesley's nephew was New Orlean's first bohemian of arts—a graceless scribbler and painter, a wastrel of wine shops, whose assistant was Monieur Auduborn, friend and painter of bird—and the little Emperor was an exile on bleak St. Helena. Rare days for love and adventure; and there is a rare love story interwoven in the historical tapestry of this narrative.

This story will begin in the Times in about two weeks—Watch for it.

The small boy came careening down the street at a terrific speed. He bumped into old women, trod on all the dogs that got in his way, upset a tray of muffins in front of a bakery, and finally collided with Mr. Smith on his way to town.

"Don't stop me!" yelled the boy as Smith seized his arm.

"I'm try to keep two fellows from fjghting!" gasped the small boy.

"What two fellows?"

"Johnny Mason and me." — Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph

Customer: "Have you that piece "Yes, we have no Bananas?"

Music Clerk: "No, we have no, yes we have no bananas. "

WHO WAS WHO IN KLEMME MANY YEARS AGO

TIMES STARTS ON 28th YEAR OF SERVICE THIS WEEK

Many Changes Have Taken Place During That Time

With this issue, Volume 28, No. 1, The Klemme Times has passed another mile stone and is launching out on it's twenty-eigth year of serving his community as a news paper.

A great many changes have taken place in the history of our little city since the first copy of the Klemme Times was turned out on an old fashioned Washington hand press, or "strong-arm" press, as they were then called. Old timers in Klemme can recall many queer incidents that happened many years ago, and in looking over an old copy of the paper we find many strange names to us, but familiar to some of you.

In those days H. O. Enger was the station agent for the B. C. R. & N. Railway,later purchased by the Rock Island. When kids were in doubt as to the initials of the railroad they had a litle verse they would repeat, like this "Bums Can't Ride North." "Doc" Spooner was the pill peddler jn those days located first door west of the bank. Two blacksmiths, H. E. Peitzke and Chas. Krouse kept old dobbin in shoes. E. A. Suckow piloted the Klemme Dray Line. Lau Bros. ran a regular department store as they advertised a full line of Dry Goods, Groecries, Harness, Machjnery, Gent's Furnishings—and a few other lines. Geo. Ell was the brick layer and was a real artist in laying up chimnies John Gruetzmacher paid the highest prjces for cattle and hogs and he most likely banked at the State Savings Bank (now the First National) and chatted with J. E. Wichman, the president as he handed his checks to C. W. Knapp, the cashier. Wesenberg Bros. also conducted a general store and we bet some great yarns were told in their store when the men would sjt around the old wood stove on boxes spitting Spear Head tobacco at the ash door. H. Schroeder conducted the City Meat Market. E. A. Reemer & Co. drew up plans and contracted for buildings of all kinds. John Baumgartner was the young man who removed whiskers and trimmed hair. Joe Miller was also in the painting business then and he told the world he did not do frescoing or fancy painting but he could sling a wicked brush and daub up a house in the latest style that was guaranteed to please. Terhufen & Sons did not run a garage but if you wanted the very latest in fine buggies they had them and also sold the best farm machinery. Harr was then in the drug store and we bet he done a good business then—years ago two lumber yards flourished here; The Northern Lbr. Co. and the J. H. Queal & Co. Schaefer & Dows conducted a general store also and we bet they had a box of "charjty terbacker" and a box of sulphur matches on the shelf for the farmers to fill up their corncob pipes with when talking politics and eating crackers and cheese (which were supposed to be free then.) George Klucknohn conducted the "ham and egg" joint and fed the hungry with the best of food and service. The Kirkwood Hotel, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Alex Kirkwood accomodated travelors with meals and lodging and had a livery stable in connection which was convenient for salesmen. Walt Bloom was in the grain an coal business then.

There were perhaps others in business at that time but their adv did not appear.

Klemme was supplied with the same number of churches as now. Chas. E. Anderson was pastor of the American M. E.; Rev. G. Heifner was pastor of the German and Germantown M. E.; and Rev. Gaterman filled the pulpit of the German Reformed church.

Klemme has changed a lot in the past few years and even during the last six years since we have been in this town we have seen many nwe improvements go up. Klemme has a fine park and band stand built only about eight or nine years ago. The park is as nice as any in this part of the state. Many new houses and new business places have been built. A modern sewer system has been installed; a new addition ha been adde to the school to accomoate many new students.

The paper itself has undergone a great many changes jn these years, and has changed hands a score of times. During the time we have here we have done our best to give Klemme a good paper and we have succeeded for our subscription list has doubled and doubled. We have installed new machinery an type; we installed a modern linotype and done away with hand setting; and we now have one of the best equipped weekly newspaper plants in this part of the state. We appreciate the co-operation of our readers and business men who have helped us to build up a profitable business out of a once small, magazine size paper.

The Times is today celebrating a happy birthday—thanks to you, our loyal businessmen and readers.

OBSCURE YOUNG MAN ACQUIRES MILLIONS

A few years ago, a young fellow named C. K. Nelson, out at Onawa, Monona county, thought he saw an oppurtunity to get rich by engaging in the manufacture of ice cream on a large scale. He borrowed $3000 and opened a factory. He soon discevered that there were a great many leaks in the business that he had not taken into account and the longer he continued the larger became his debtedness. Finally he hit upon the new idea, that of enclsing the ice cream in a coating of chocolate. After numerous discouraging failures, he finally hit upon the sucessful plan of dipping bars of ice cream in melted chocalate, at a temperature of 90, degrees, wrapping them in tin foil and then packing them away in ice. After a long hard fight, he obtained a patent on the idea. Then began the difficult task of interesting investors in the invention, in order that it might be developed commercjally. And in this he succeeded an his fortune was mae. He selected a happy name for his product "Eskimo Pie". He receives a royalty upon every "pie" sold through the world and is already a millionaire and promises to overtake Henry Ford.

HAVE YOU VOTED YET?

Nice Looking Young Woman Works Old Subscription Graft in Ringsted

A nice looking young woman dropped into the Kearns pool hall one afternoon last week and asked the bunch if they had voted yet. She caught them all off their feet as not one person could think of any election which interested him on that date. Then she sprung that old "gag" of aking subscriptions for the Saturday Evening Post for which she received votes and in this way worked her way through college. She looked old enough to have finished college ten years ago. If anyone parted with a dollar for the mazazine we doubt very mueh if they ever get it.

In the meantime her partner, a nice looking "lounge lizard" was working the homes about town wiih his graft. He also reported he was working his way through college but he was selling a ten cent knife sharpener for fifty cents.

There are so many grafts and skin games being worked on people now days that we advise them to show all peddler the door unless it is some of the home folks they know who are canvassing.—Ringsted Dispatch

FIGHT TO CONQUER PLAGUE AND FAMINE IN QUAKE DISTRICT

NEARLY MILLION AND HALF PERSONS ON THE VERGE OF STARVATION.

THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND HOMES FELL IN QUAKE

Moratorium Is Proclaimed by the Government as It Wars on Profiteers —Food Supplies in Tokyo and Yokohama Are Said to Be Inadequate.

Osaka, Sept. 8.—The police of Tokyo have reported that up to Saturday morning inquests had been held on 32,564 bodies in the yard of the Honjo military clothing warehouse alone.

Three emergency imperial ordinances were promulgated. One provides that persons found profiteering in essential commodities shall be liable to three years' imprisonment or a fine of not more than 3,000 yen. Another establishes a thirty-day moratorium except for payment of wages due, and the third provides that persons found guilty of publishing or communicating to others rumors or statements likely to cause breaches of public order shall be liable to imprisonment with penal servitude for no more than ten years and fines up to 3,000 yen.

Great Disorder at Tokyo.

The greatest disorder prevails at all exits from Tokyo and in the frenzied rush from the city weaker refugees are trampled under foot. Every train carries about 4,000 refugees. Thursday alone nine trains left Akabane, some miles north of Tokyo, with 40,000 persons. It was raining and roof passengers turned their parched mouths skyward to catch drops. The suburbs are indescribably overcrowded, but the supply of rations is improving.

According to the central meteorological station 1,039 shocks were recorded from the first big shock on Saturday until Thursday morning at 6 o'clock. Danger of further serious shocks is considered to be over.

Thousands of Dead Unburied.

Departure of foreigners continues. Enough food is being distributed to prevent starvation. Foreigners have sufficient for a few days. Thousands of dead bodies are still lying unburied. Intense heat hinders salvage work. The water supply is good, but electric lighting is restricted.

The latest report from Yokohama states that 200 foreign residents lost their lives. Charred corpses have been gathered temporarily on the site of the wrecked Grand hotel and will be taken later for burial to the foreign cemetery in Tokyo.

Awaits Relief Ships.

One week after its great disaster all Japan is watching the race of relief ships against plague and famine for control of her devastated areas.

Simultaneously with the arrival at her ports of American ships bearing much needed medical and food supplies, the nation was confronted with the disturbing whisper that evidences of cholera had appeared in the waste that was Yokohama.

Details are lacking as yet, but careful medical supervision of arriving refugees has been inaugurated.

It is considered probable that cases of cholera have occurred due to congestion in refugee centers. The Yokohama relief bureau is making every effort to break up hordes of refugees clustered in public parks and get them under canvas in sanitary police camps.

Roderick Matheson, who reached Kobe, said that the foreign residential section of Yokohama was nothing but a mass of charred ruins and bodies.

"Of 200 guests in the Grand hotel," said Matheson, "few were able to make their escape when the earth tremors began to rock the buildings. Many of the foreigners were lunching at the United club. This building collapsed and virtually every person in it lost his life.

Hotels Crash to Earth.

"The Oriental Palace hotel literally sank into the earth and the guests had no chance for their lives. The majority of the houses on the bluff collapsed with the first tremendous shock. Frantic appeals for help were heard from the ruins, but only in a few instances was it possible to render assistance.

"On the bluff overlooking the city the Court and Cherrymount hotels seemed to have been lifted from their foundations and hurled into the ruins below. The Bluff hotel tumbled over on the opposite side of the bluff."

It is reported that E. Hamilton Holmes, British consul general at Yokohama, is dead, and that Prince Matsukata, who had been listed as dead, is alive.

Refugees on Crippled Liner.

Hongkong, Sept. 8.—The Canadian Pacific steamship company agency here received advices from the company's Kobe agent that, after being fouled by two steamers as a result of the tidal wave following last Saturday's earthquake, the liner Empress of Australia maneuvered to the outside of the harbor at Yokohama and anchored in a safe position at noon last Sunday.

The message said the vessel had a hard fight to reach safety, but gave no details. It was added that as soon as divers had been brought from Kobe and had cut away a cable with which the ship's propeller had become entangled, she would proceed to Kobe to land a number of refugees that had been taken on board and to obtain provisions and fresh water. The vessel then will proceed to Vancouver, B. C.

Japan Pushes Relief Work.

Nagasaki, Sept. 8.—Relief in the earthquake zone is proceeding vigorously. The Tokyo government is preparing to extend funds from its reserves without restriction for purchase of provisions. The entire stock of army and navy tents has been placed at the disposal of the homeless pending completion of barracks which are now under construction.

Banks have resumed business and are paying out sums not to exceed 100 yen to a person. The vice governor at the Bank of Japan has returned to Tokyo and announced resumption of business. The specie held in the head office, amounting to 1,050,000,000 yen, and the deposits amounting to 2,320,000,000 yen, are intact.

District of Horror.

Kobe, Sept. 8.—The horror district of Japan has become a land of pestilence.

Plague, disease and famine have made their appearance in the stricken area, as reports of an outbreak of cholera, dysentery and yellow fever combined with an acute food shortage in and around Tokyo and Yokohama reach this city.

In spite of temporary relief measures the food supply for millions of homeless in the disaster zone is wholly inadequate and stark famine threatens to add to the general horror.

Water Polluted.

Polluted well and river water—the only available supply for millions of fear-crazed people—is beginning to add to the death toll already claimed by earthquake, fire and an all-destroying back wash from a convulsed sea.

Tokyo and Yokohama, as well as scores of smaller cities and hundreds of villages and hamlets, are desolate piles of charred ruins filled with dead.

Transportation and communication throughout the empire continue virtually paralyzed. What telegraph wires are in operation are overcrowded with official business, and adequate transmission of news reports is out of the question.

Scene of Desolation.

The country from twenty miles north of Tokyo to Kodzu, forty miles south, is a vast scene of desolation and ruin, wherein human life is no longer significant. Three-fourths of Tokyo is a smoldering ruin, wherein thousands of earthquake and fire victims were trapped.

City in Ruins in Six Hours.

Yokohama ceased to exist six hours after a titanic convulsion. Buildings collapsed instantly, roads writhed in billows, and cracks twenty feet wide tants who sought to run away from swallowed up terror-stricken inhabi- the scene. Beneath brick and tiles thousands lay blackened, while fire was sweeping everything, preventing rescues.

The harbor was a scene of wildest confusion, the seismic waves dashing liners together, crashing against the concrete docks and hurtling the hulls in all directions. The Empress of Australia and the Steel Navigator were fouled, the former losing its propeller.

Harbor Swept by Blazing Oil.

Burning oil swept the harbor, while rescue work was being frantically pursued.

Communications are broken, railroads are twisted aimless, lines of steel and iron roads are split by cracks, bridges and wires are down.

From Tokyo and Yokohama Japanese refugees by thousands are trudging the countryside, itself wrecked and foodless.

American and British shipping at Yokohama led the relief, the Jefferson landing rice in care of the Salvation army.

Banks Reopening.

The principal banks in the stricken zone are reopening. The Bank of Japan came through the disaster with hardly any damage. The contents of the vaults of the Mitsui bank and of other large financial institations were saved.

The Bank of Japan's gold reserve, amounting to $100,000,000, is safe. All indications are that Japan's banks are in excellent condition and are ready to give good service to the labors of reconstruction.

From the Tokyo Central observatory comes a reassurance that no anxiety need be felt as to sudden renewal of the earthquake. The shocks that have been recorded during the last few days are said to be "hangovers" from the earlier tremblors. The observatory announces that the movement of the earth has been gradually diminishing.

To Remove Stains.

Paint stains can be removed from clothes by saturating the stain with equal parts of ammonia and spirits of turpentine. Repeat the process two or three times if necessary, then wash out in warm, soapy water. Test first to see if color stands.

Perspiration will often make stains on white or light-colored material which cannot be removed by ordinary washing. An excellent method of treatment consists of soaking the material in a solution of carbonate of soda and water. A teaspoonful of soda should be allowed to each half-gallon of cold water. Let the material soak for half an hour, and then wash in the usual way.

Rusty irons can be made beautifully smooth in the following way: Tie a lump of beeswax in a piece of muslin, heat the iron and rub it alternately with the waxed bag and on a cloth sprinkled with salt.

MINERS YIELD; STRIKE AT END

Workers' Acceptance of Pinchot Terms Returns Men to Pits.

FULL RECOGNITION OF UNION

Eight-Hour Day Granted, With Overtime—Uniform Increase of 10 Per Cent Given Men—Check-Off to Be Dropped.

Harrisburg, Pa., Sept. 8.—Unanimous acceptance by the full anthracite committee of anthracite miners of the four points advanced by Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania paved the way for the settlement of the strike of 155,000 anthracite miners, now in its seventh day.

The four points on which Governor Pinchot settled the strike follow:

1. Recognition of the basic eight-hour day for all employees; if longer hours are necessary at certain mines or in certain occupations, the overtime to be paid for at the eight-hour rate.

2. A uniform increase of 10 per cent for all employees. This increase to take effect September 1.

3. Full recognition of the union by the operators, without the check-off, but the right to have a union representative present when the men are paid.

4. Complete recognition of the principles of collective bargaining.

An additional point to replace No. 1, which both sides had agreed upon, was made in the governor's suggestion to have a joint board investigate all conflicting wage rates to remove inequalities.

A joint session of miners and operators was held in the governor's reception room at the State house to work out a contract and to reduce in writing certain minor points still in dispute.

Members of the scale committee are holding themselves in readiness to approve the final draft of the contract, which will then be printed and sent to 300 local unions of anthracite miners, who will send delegates to a tri-district miners' convention to be held in Scranton or Wilkes-Barre next week.

It is not expected that mining of coal can be resumed before another ten days have passed, even if the final negotiations are completed without a hitch.

Crop Values $4,710,000,000, Says Farm Research Bo

Chicago, Sept. 8.—The statement that the farmers' income for this year's crop will be $1,000,000,000 more than for that of 1922 is exaggerated 400 per cent, according to the research department of the American Farm Bureau federation. Figures compiled by W. Moorhouse of the farm bureau research department show that the total farm crop values for the year 1923-24 will approximate $4,710,000,000, as against a total of $4,479,000,000 for 1922-23.

Rome Hears That Greece Is Mobilizing Troops on Front

Rome, Sept. 8.—A dispatch from Santi Quaranta says that Greece is mobilizing troops on the Albanian frontier. Trieste hears that Jugo-Slavia is preparing to mobilize its army. It is said the Belgrade government claims mobilization is necessary to protect its frontiers in the event its ally, Greece, engages in a war, and also because of troubles in Hungary and Bulgaria.

Washington, Sept. 8.—America placed its resources at the disposal of Japan, President Coolidge announced here, following a meeting of the cabinet devoted to consideration of measures for expediting relief to the victims of the earthquake and conflagration. At least $20,000,000 and possibly $30,000,000 will be required for the relief undertaking and America is expected to contribute a large proportion of this amount.

Thompson had been having engine trouble, and for ten minutes had been flying back and forth over Colton in an apparent attempt to find a landing place. He was flying to Chicago when the accident occurred. The mail was picked up and taken to Chicago on another plane.

TWO TRAINS LESS

ROCK ISLAND TAKES OFF TWO TRAINS

The Rock Island has taken off the morning passenger north and the evening passenger south. The new change went into effect Sunday.

The trains which were taken off were the mots important as the morning passenger brought in mail, express and passengers from the east and south and made excellent connections. Likewise the biggest share of out-going mail nad express was carried on the evening train south, making connections for east and south. In place of these two trains makeshift passengers have been made of the mid-day trains to carry mail, express and passegners. The passenger goes south at 11:24 a. m., starting at Lakota and runing to Dows, and returns going north at 2:40 p. m. Formerly the passenger ran between Iowa Falls and Estherville. The new schedule makes connections with the main line at Dows and Lakota. It starts nowhere and ends up the same place and makes it bad to get anywhere.

The freight runs as usual; going south at 11:55 a. m. and north at 1:05 p. m.

The move by the management of the Rock Island is a grand effort to slash expenses. But we are told it does not remove a single employee and the savings in operating does not seem to warrant crippling the service. Every town along the line is protesting and some are said to be fighting the change, tooth and toe nail, and eventually it may bring on a better schedule. A motor running on the old passenger schedule would be a great relief.

The work of organization will begin in September with the appointment of committees in every county by the local health organizations.

The proceeds of the seal sale are usd by the local associations jn various forms of child health work nurs ing, health education, fresh air camps, clinics, etc., and a portion by the State organization in the prevention of tuberculosis both in humans and animals, and in general health work.

This is the fifteenth annual Christmas seal. During the fifteen years in which the money thus raised has been used in preventing disease and promoting health the tuberculosis death rate has been reduced fifty per cent, infant mortality, twenty percent and the general death rate twenty per cen.

We must get back to living in our homes as the builders of the Republic did.

This country was founded on its homes. The Colonists braved the perils and the privations of the wilderness to establish homes where they could work out their ideals and inspirations.

Too many families regard home as merely a place where they eat, sleep and dress——not a place to LIVE.

ARE YOU MAKING "CHICKEN EATERS"

DoYou want to develope a first class "chicken eater" out of your best sow or gilt? Then just feed her a ration, such as one nearly all corn, which is deficient, allow the chickens to run in the hog lots, and the chances are that you will have a "chicken eater'" in a short time.

But if you wish to break the gilt or sow of eating "chikcen dinners" at your exense, an improvement of the ration by adding protien in the form of buttermilk or tankage, will usually prove effective. Getting her protien in this form will probably induce the offended to "do away with" eating chickens to get it.

According to the animal husbandry department of Iowa State College, various methods of curing "chicken eaters" have been suggested. One of these "sure cures" is treating a dead chicken with some substance that is distasteful to thes ow and put it in her yard. However, he animal husbandry department says most methods other than that of balancing the ration have generally been sucessful.

Link had tied two long, heavy planks upon the car, one on each side, and in every available space he had strapped extra tires. A huge cask occupied one back seat, and another seat was full of tools and ropes. There was just room in this rear part of the car for Nels to squeeze in. Link put Madeline in front beside him, then bent over the wheel. Madeline waved her hand at the silent cowboys on the porch. Not an audible good-by was spoken.

The car glided out of the yard, leaped from level to slope, and started swiftly down the road, out into the open valley. Each stronger rush of dry wind in Madeline's face marked the increase of speed. The buzz, the roar of wheels, of heavy body in flight, increased to a continuous droning hum. The wind became an insupportable body moving toward her, crushing her breast, making the task of breathing most difficult. To Madeline the time seemed to fly with the speed of miles.

Cactus barred the way, rocks barred the way, gullies barred the way, and these Nels addressed in the grim humor with which he was wont to view tragic things. Again and again Link used the planks to cross washes in sand. Presently he came to a ditch where water had worn deep into the road. Without hesitation he placed them, measuring distance carefully, and then started across. The danger was in ditching the machine. One of the planks split, sagged a little, but Link made the crossing without slip.

At length a mile of clean, brown slope, ridged and grooved like a washboard, led gently down to meet the floor of the valley, where the scant grama-grass struggled to give a tinge of gray. The road appeared to become more clearly defined, and could be seen striking straight across the valley.

To Madeline's dismay, that road led down to a deep, narrow wash. The crossing would have been laborsome for a horse; for an automobile it was impassable. Link drove back to the road, crossed it, and kept on down the line of the wash. It was a deep cut in red earth, worn straight down by swift water in the rainy season. It narrowed. When Link reached the narrowest points he got out of the car and walked from place to place. Once with a little jump he cleared the wash. Then Madeline noted that the farther rim was somewhat lower. In a flash she divined Link's intention. He was hunting a place to jump the car over the crack in the ground.

Soon he found one that seemed to suit him, for he tied his red scarf upon a greasewood-bush. Then, returning to the car, he clambered in, backed up the gentle slope and halted just short of steeper ground. Hunching low over the wheel, he started, slowly at first, then faster, and then faster. The great car gave a spring like a huge tiger. The impact of suddenly formed wind almost tore Madeline out of her seat. She felt Nels' powerful hands on her shoulders. She closed her eyes. The jolting headway of the car gave place to a gliding rush. This was broken by a slight jar, and then above the hum and roar rose a cowboy yell. Madeline waited with strained nerves for the expected crash. It did not come. Opening her eyes, she saw the level valley floor without a break. She had not even noticed the instant when the car had shot over the wash.

A strange breathlessness attacked her, and she attributed it to the celerity with which she was being carried along. Pulling the hood down over her face, she sank low in the seat. The whir of the car now seemed to be a world-filling sound. There was a long, blank period from which she awakened to feel an arm supporting her. Then she rallied. The velocity of the car had been cut to the speed to which she was accustomed. Throwing back the hood, she breathed freely again, recovered fully.

The car was bowling along a wide road upon the outskirts of a city. Madeline asked what place it could be.

"Douglas," replied Link. "An' jest around is Agua Prieta!"

That last name seemed to stun Madeline. She heard no more, and saw little until the car stopped. Nels spoke to some one. Then sight of khaki-clad soldiers quickened Madeline's faculties. She was on the boundary-line between the United States and Mexico, and Agua Prieta, with its white and blue-walled houses, its brown-tiled roofs, lay before her. A cavalry officer approached the car, stared, and removed his sombrero.

"Can you tell me anything about Stewart, the American cowboy who was captured by rebels a few days ago?" asked Madeline.

"Yes," replied the officer. "Stewart is reported to have done reckless fighting and was captured. He got a Mexican sentence. He is known here along the border, and the news of his capture stirred up excitement. We did all we could to get his release. The guerrillas feared to execute him here, and believed he might be aided to escape. So a detachment departed with him for Mezquital."

"He was sentenced to be shot Thursday at sunset—tonight?"

"Yes. I regret that I can't give you definite information. If you are friends of Stewart's — relatives — I might find—"

"I am his wife," interrupted Madeline. "Will you please read these." She handed him the telegrams. "Advise me—help me, if you can?"

With a wondering glance at her the officer received the telegrams. He read several, and whistled low in amaze. His manner became quick, alert, serious.

"I can't read these written in Spanish, but I know the names signed." Swiftly he ran through the others. "Why, these mean Stewart's release has been authorized. They explain mysterious rumors we have heard here. Greaser treachery! For some strange reason messages from the rebel junta have failed to reach their destination. I'll go with you to General Salazar, the rebel chief in command. I know him. Perhaps we can find out something."

Nels made room for the officer. Link sent the car whirring across the line into Mexican territory. The road ended in an immense plaza, in the center of which was a circular structure that in some measure resembled a corral. It was a bull-ring, where the national sport of bull-fighting was carried on.

Madeline caught a glimpse of tents inside, then her view was obstructed by a curious, pressing throng. The cavalry officer leaped from the car and pushed his way into the entrance.

How stifling was this crowded, ill-smelling plaza! The sun, red and lowering, had sloped far down in the west, but still burned with furnace heat. A swarm of flies whirled over the car. The shadows of low-sailing buzzards crossed Madeline's sight. Then she saw a row of the huge, uncanny black birds sitting upon the tiled roof of a house. They had neither an air of sleeping nor resting. They were waiting. She fought off a horrible ghastly idea before its full realization.

Suddenly the crowd parted to let the cavalry officer and a rebel of striking presence get to the car.

"Madam, it is as I suspected," said the officer, quickly. "The messages directing Stewart's release never reached Salazar. They were intercepted. But even without them we might have secured Stewart's exchange if it had not been for the fact that one of his captors wanted him shot. This guerrilla intercepted the orders, and then was instrumental in taking Stewart to Mezquital. It is exceedingly sad. Why, he should be a free man this instant. I regret—"

"Who did this—this thing?" cried Madeline, cold and sick. "Who is the guerrilla?"

"Senor Don Carlos Martinez. He has been a bandit, a man of influence in Sonora. He is more of a secret agent in the affairs of the revolution than an active participator. But he has seen guerrilla service."

"Don Carlos! Stewart in his power! Oh, God!" Madeline sank down, almost overcome. Then two great hands, powerful, thrilling, clasped her shoulders, and Nels bent over her.

"Miss Majesty, shore we're wastin' time here," he said. His voice, like his hands, was uplifting. She wheeled to him in trembling importunity. How cold, bright, blue the flash of his eyes! They told Madeline she must not weaken. But she could not speak her thought to Nels—could only look at Link.

"It figgers impossible, but I'll do it!" said Link Stevens, in answer to her voiceless query.

"Can I get a permit to go into the interior—to Mezquital?" asked Madeline of the officer.

"You are going on? Madam, it's a forlorn hope. Mezquital is a hundred miles away. But there's a chance—the barest chance if your man can drive this car. The Mexicans are either murderous or ceremonious in their executions. The arrangements for Stewart's will be elaborate. But, barring unusual circumstances, it will take place precisely at the hour designated. You need no permit. Your messages are official papers. But to save time, perhaps delay, I suggest you take this Mexican, Senor Montes, with you. He outranks Don Carlos and knows the captain of the Mezquital detachment."

"I thank you, sir. I shall not forget your kindness," concluded Madeline.

The white, narrow road flashed out of the foreground, slipped with inconceivable rapidity under the car. When she marked a clump of cactus far ahead it seemed to shoot at her, to speed behind her even the instant she noticed it. Nevertheless, Madeline knew Link was not putting the car to its limit. Swiftly as he was flying, he held something in reserve. And every leaf and blade and branch of cactus bore wicked thorns, any one of which would be fatal to a tire.

It came at length, the bursting report. The car lurched, went on like a crippled thing, and halted, obedient to the master hand at the wheel. Swift as Link was in replacing the tire, he lost time. The red sun, more sullen, duskier as it neared the black, bold horizon, appeared to mock Madeline, to eye her in derision.

Link leaped in, and the car sprang ahead. The road began to wind up; it turned and twisted in tantalizing, lazy curves; it was in no hurry to surmount a hill that began to assume proportions of a mountain; it was leisurely, as were all things in Mexico except strife. That was quick, fierce, bloody—it was Spanish.

The descent from that elevation was difficult, extremely hazardous, yet Link Stevens drove fast. Then, in taking an abrupt curve, a grasping spear ruined another tire. This time the car rasped across the road into the cactus, bursting the second front-wheel tire. Like demons indeed Link and Nels worked. Shuddering, Madeline felt the declining heat of the sun, saw with gloomy eyes the shading of the red light over the desert. She did not look back to see how near the sun was to the horizon. She wanted to ask Nels. Strange as anything on this terrible ride was the absence of speech. As yet no word had been spoken. Madeline wanted to shriek to Link to hurry. But he was more than humanly swift in all his actions. So with mute lips, with the fire in her beginning to chill, with a lifelessness menacing her spirit, she watched, hoped against hope, prayed for a long, straight, smooth road.

Quite suddenly she saw it, seemingly miles of clear, narrow lane disappearing like a thin, white streak in distant green. Perhaps Link Stevens' heart leaped like Madeline's. The huge car with a roar and a jerk seemed to answer Madeline's call, a cry no less poignant because it was silent.

Faster, faster, faster! The roar became a whining hum. Then for Madeline sound ceased to be anything—she could not hear. The wind was now heavy, imponderable, no longer a swift, plastic thing, but solid, like an onrushing wall. It bore down upon Madeline with such resistless weight that she could not move. The green of desert plants along the road merged in two shapeless fences, sliding at her from the distance. Objects ahead began to blur the white road, to grow streaky, like rays of light, the sky to take on more of a reddening haze.

That was Madeline's last clear sensation upon the ride. Blinded, dazed, she succumbed to the demands upon her strength. She reeled, fell back, only vaguely aware of a helping hand. Confusion seized her senses. All about her was a dark chaos through which she was rushing, rushing, rushing under the wrathful eye of a setting sun.

But at an end of infinite time that rush ceased. Madeline lost the queer feeling of being disembodied by a frightfully swift careening through boundless distance. She distinguished voices, low at first, apparently far away. Then she opened her eyes to blurred but conscious sight.

The car had come to a stop. Link was lying face down over the wheel. Nels was rubbing her hands, calling to her. She saw a house with clean white-washed wall and brown-tiled roof. Beyond, over a dark mountain range, peeped the last red curve, the last beautiful ray of the setting sun.

CHAPTER XXIII

At the End of the Road.

Madeline saw that the car was surrounded by armed Mexicans. They presented a contrast to the others she had seen that day; she wondered a little at their silence, at their respectful front.

Suddenly a sharp spoken order opened up the ranks next to the house. Senor Montes appeared in the break, coming swiftly. His dark face wore a smile; his manner was courteous, important, authoritative.

"Senora, you got here in time. El Capitan Stewart will be free."

"Free!" she whispered.

She rose, reeling.

"Come," replied Montes, taking her arm. "Perdoneme, Senora.

Senor Montes led Madeline through a hall to a patio, and on through a large room with flooring of rough, bare boards that rattled, into a smaller room full of armed quiet rebels facing an open window.

Montes directed Madeline's attenton to a man by the window. A loose scarf of vivid red hung from his hand.

"Senora, they were waiting for the sun to set when we arrived," said Montes. "The signal was about to be given for Senor Stewart's walk to death."

"Stewart's walk!" echoed Madeline.

"Ah, Senora, let me tell you his sentence—the sentence I have had the honor and happiness to revoke for you."

Stewart had been court-martialed and sentenced according to a Mexican custom observed in cases of brave soldiers to whom honorable and fitting executions were due. His hour had been set for Thursday when the sun had sunk. Upon signal he was to be liberated and was free to walk out into the road, to take any direction he pleased. He knew his sentence; knew that death awaited him, that every possible avenue of escape was blocked by men with rifles ready. But he had not the slightest idea at what moment or from what direction the bullets were to come.

"Senora, we have sent messengers to every squad of waiting soldiers—an order that El Capitan is not to be shot. He is ignorant of his release. I shall give the signal for his freedom."

"Is there no—no possibility of a mistake?" faltered Madeline.

"None. My order included unloading of rifles."

"Don Carlos?"

"He is in irons, and must answer to General Salazar," replied Montes.

With a heart stricken by both joy and agony, she saw Montes give the signal.

Then she waited. No change manifested itself down the length of that lonely road. There was absolute silence in the room behind her. How terribly, infinitely long seemed the waiting!

Suddenly a door opened and a tall men stepped out.

Madeline recognized Stewart. She had to place both hands on the window-sill for support, while a storm of emotion swayed her. Like a retreating wave it rushed away. Stewart lived. He was free. He had stepped out into the light. She had saved him. Life changed for her in that instant of realization and became sweet, full, strange.

Stewart shook hands with some one in the doorway. Then he looked up and down the road. The door closed behind him. Leisurely he rolled a cigarette, stood close to the wall while he scratched a match. Even at that distance Madeline's keen eyes caught the small flame, the first little puff of smoke.

Stewart then took to the middle of the road and leisurely began his walk.

Madeline watched him, with pride, love, pain, glory combating for a mastery over her. This walk of his seemingly took longer than all her hours of awakening, of strife, of remorse, longer than the ride to find him. She felt that it would be impossible for her to wait till he reached the end of the road. Yet in the hurry and riot of her feelings she had fleeting panics. She wanted to run to meet him. Nevertheless, she stood rooted to her covert behind the window, living that terrible walk with him to the uttermost thought of home, sister, mother, sweetheart, wife, life itself—every thought that could come to a man stalking to meet his executioners. With all that tumult in her mind and heart Madeline still fell prey to the incomprehensible variations of emotion possible to a woman. Every step Stewart took thrilled her. She had some strange, subtle intuition that he was not unhappy, and that he believed beyond shadow of doubt that he was walking to his death. His steps dragged a little, though they had begun to be swift. The old, hard, physical, wild nerve of the cowboy was perhaps in conflict with spiritual growth of the finer man, realizing too late that life ought not to be sacrificed.

"Who Are You?" He Whispered Hoarsely.

Then the dark gleam that was his face took shape, grew sharper and clearer. He was stalking now, and there was a suggestion of impatience in his stride. It took these hidden Mexicans a long time to kill him! At a point in the middle of the road, even with the corner of a house and opposite to Madeline's position, Stewart halted stockstill. He presented a fair, bold mark to his executioners, and he stood there motionless a full moment.

That wait was almost unendurable for Madeline. Perhaps it was only a moment, several moments at the longest, but the time seemed a year. Stewart's face was scornful, hard. Did he suspect treachery on the part of his captors, that they meant to play with him as a cat with a mouse, to murder him at leisure? Madeline was sure she caught the old, inscrutable, mocking smile fleeting across his lips. He held that position for what must have been a reasonable time to his mind, then with a laugh and a shrug he threw the cigarette into the road. He shook his head as if at the incomprehensible motives of men who could have no fair reasons now for delay.

He made a sudden violent action that was more than a straightening of his powerful frame. It was the old instinctive violence. Then he faced north. Madeline read his thought, knew he was thinking of her, calling her a last silent farewell. He would serve her to his last breath, leave her free, keep his secret. That picture of him, dark-browed, fire-eyed, strangely sad and strong, sank indelibly into Madeline's heart of hearts.

The next instant he was striding forward, to force by bold and scornful presence a speedy fulfillment of his sentence.

Madeline stepped into the door, crossed the threshold. Stewart staggered as if indeed the bullets he expected had pierced him in mortal wound. His dark face turned white. His eyes had the rapt stare, the wild fear of a man who saw an apparition, yet who doubted his sight. Perhaps he had called to her as the Mexicans called to their Virgin; perhaps he imagined sudden death had come unawares, and this was her image appearing to him in some other life.

"Who — are — you?" he whispered, hoarsely.

She tried to lift her hands, failed, tried again, and held them out, trembling.

"It is I. Majesty. Your wife!"

TOAST TO WORLD'S LAST WAR

Bottle of Ancient Wine to Be Passed On, to Be Drunk When Strife Ends.

When the world fights its last war, some veteran of an American war may drink a bottle of wine preserved for years for the coming of such an event.

The wine recently occupied the place of honor on the banquet table of the Last Man club, formed from the survivors of Company B., First Minnesota Volunteers, a Civil war organization. The club was formed thirty years ago, with 34 members. There was an understanding that a reunion should be held each year. The wine was presented to the club on its organization, and it was agreed that the last survivor should attend the banquet, and drink the rare old vintage to the vacant chairs of his departed comrades.

This year only three were present at the meeting, which was held in Stillwater, Minn., on the anniversary of the battle of Bull Run. Peter Hall, president of the club, declared during the meeting that the requirements of the constitution would make the last occasion too sorrowful, and suggested another way to mark the passing of the organization. He offered a plan that the last two survivors should drink a toast, seal the remainder of the wine in the bottle, and pass it on to the American Legion in Stillwater, with similar stipulation as to its retention, or until all nations join to make war impossible. Thus, the Stillwater Legion men are expected to become possessors of the wine, perhaps to be passed on to some other veterans' organization founded from another American war.

Peter Hall, Atwater, Minn.; John Goff, a guest at the Minneapolis Soldiers' home; and Charles Lockwood, Chamberlain, S. D., were the guests at this year's meeting. One other survivor, Emil Graff, of St. Cloud, Fla., was kept from the meeting because of physical infirmities.

The unique event attracted national attention, and the proposal to pass on the rare wine to the American Legion, not to be touched until war has become impossible, has resulted in considerable speculation as to whether the World war veterans would drink the final toast.

ISSUES 'HOME LOAN' WARNING

Legion Officials Caution Oregon Veterans Against Assuming Too Heavy Financial Burdens.

Unscrupulous dealers in real estate are said to have taken advantage of former service men in the state of Oregon, which by law has provided for a "home loan" feature of compensation for veterans. Officials of the American Legion, to whom have been reported a number of instances in which the veteran has faced loss of his investment, have issued a communication to members of that organization, warning them against assuming too heavy a financial burden under the plan.

The law, as passed by the state legislature, was intended by its sponsors to finance the purchase of homes or farms for veterans, when they have sufficient income to carry the payments.

According to the Legion leaders, certain real estate men are showing a tendency to depreciate or discount the loan of the veteran, or to demand additional cash down. Some firms have claimed that the plan outlined by the law was not feasible to handle, and that the business was conducted at a loss.

There have been 400 bonus loans in Oregon to date, according to the records of the state officials. Of this number, only seven veterans face foreclosure on property, a refutation of the statement that realty dealers had found the plan unsuccessful.

The principal difficulty has been, Legion investigators say, to keep the veterans from paying too much for homes or farms. Payments on property selling at $5,000 or more are heavy, and veterans are urged to consider the fact that in case they have put a second mortgage on their place to a realty dealer, they must pay the state a certain sum in addition to that due the real estate man.

SUPPORT OF LEGION ASSURED

Religious and Fraternal Organizations Pledge Aid to Work of World War Men.

Unanimous support by numerous religious and fraternal organizations of the American Legion was pledged at a recent meeting of these groups held in Washington. A resolution adopted at the gathering quoted the preamble to the Legion's constitution, and then continued:

"We heartily approve this statement and the American Legion as a great organization composed of men and women who served their country in the World war, earnestly hoping that they will continue to serve their country in time of peace with the same patriotic devotion that animated them in the days when they wore the uniform. We pledge them our cordial support, wishing them all success and every blessing as they pursue these high ideals."

Organizations joining in the tribute were the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, Knights of Columbus, Salvation Army, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, Young Men's Christian association, American Red Cross and National Catholic Welfare Council.

When a tub of butter gets into the "shake" it is then just luck as o who gets the blue ribbon, as it is a hard matter to judge between the various tubs in the "shake."

Gimer has a tub of butter entered at the Waterloo Dairy Catle Congress and the judging will take place September 27th. He plans to attend the scoring on that date.

CORN FODDER POOR COW FEED

Its Use Instead of Silage Cuts Mjlk Flow 6 Per Cent and Fat3 Per Cent

The use of corn fodder instead of corn silage in the ration of the diary cow, reduces milk production approximately 6 per cent and fat production 3 per cent, according to the djar y husbandry department of Iowa State College in Bulletin 212, recently published by the Iowa Experment Station. Tests were conducted to compare the value of roughages for the feeding of diary cows.

Reports of the tests indicate that very positive results were secured Summary statements admit no misinterpretation or doubt as to the comparative value of the roughes commonly used on Iowa Farms.

"When timothy hay is used to replace alfalfa hay in a good diary ration, the production of milk and butterfat is reduced 7 per cent," says the bulletin. When corn fodder and timothy hay are introduced in a ration in place of corn silage and alfalfa, there is a decrease of 18 percent in milk and 14 percent in fat production.

"Corn silage and a legume hay(alfalfa) are the best roughages for diary cattle, while corn fodder and timothy hay are poor," Bulletin 212 says. It adds. "If the corn crop is all to be fed to the cows it should be put into the silo. On the diary farm, hays such as timothy should be sold and legume hays purchased in their stead.

The farm population will keep on dwindling just as long as the city has a monopoly of high wages and high jinks.

Farm Bureau Women Take Nutrition Course

FARM BUREAU MEETS

Ladies f Liberty and Eli Township held a joint meeting, at the home of Mrs. Sumner Trumbell, in an all day session. This meeting was under the instruction of Miss Dorothy Taylor, a nutrition specialist, from the Extensin Department a Ames. Twenty ladies are expected to take these lessons, Ten of each Township. It is given in thef orm of a training school,in which there are fine lessons. There is one lesson a month until the course is completed.

These ladies in turn are expected to pass this work on to their neighbors.

Miss Taylor proved a very interesting instructor and th class enjoyed several hours of good work. This t fly is the study of the food values and the uses of various foods. Te women were given six fundamental rules, for food selections, and we will expect a great change in the diet of most families, as a result of the study of these rules.

We should learn o ue more milk, fruits, vegetables cereals andl ess les meat and sugar. Great stress is put on the value of milk as a food, 1 1-2 pints is the least a child can get along with and 1 quart is the ideal amount per day. Reports from the county show that 35 per cent of the children are underweigh

This is a deplorable condition and we hope much of this will be overcome by the study of the food charts and study of food values, prepared by Miss Taylor.

Two things she especially emphasized was the value of hot lunches for the school children and that the children must be taught to eat what is good for hem.

We believe that this course will prove to be a great help in many ways.

At the next meeting the menu for luncheon will be dishes prepard under the supervision of the instructor.

There were seven visitors besides the following ladies that are enrolled in the course.

BIG FIRE RAGED IN KLEMME LAST FRIDAY

TWO BUILDINGS WIPED OUT BY FIRE; CONTENTS LOST

Greimann Motor Company Suffer Enormous Loss

NO INSURANCE ON GARAGE

Etchen Bros. Pool Hall Loss Was Covered By Insurance

Fire was discovered to be raging in the Greimann Motor Company at 7:30 o'clock last Friday morning.

The fire department arrived in a few minutes and a large crowd had gathere l to help in getting out what cars they could; the smoke being so heavy that this work was almost impossible. In a short while the entire building was a solid mass of flame, rapidly consuming the building and contents and threatening to break into the creamery next door west, but heroic efforts saved this building. The fire next broke into the Etchen Bros. Pool Hall, a frame buildng at the east side. It was possible to save some of the contents of this building before flames became dangerous. Likewise the barber shop of G. P. McCullough was threatened by fire and the contents of that building were removed to safety; also the Swift Station's equipment was moved out of the building. The Elite Cafe, two doors east of the pool hall, was also thot to be in danger and so the contents were removed to safety.

The fire in the double cement block building of the garage soon became uncontrollable and was eating into the adjoining pool hall and it was at this time a call was put in for the Belmond Fire Compny to bring their chemical truck. They made a record run and arived in 25 minutes. They got their engine in operation and turned chemicals into the pool hall and checked the fire which was then raging high and was very threatening. The Belmond fire boys are to be complimented on their quick trip and ability as firefighters, and it was demonstrated that a chemical truck should be installed in Klemme. The fire had too great a start to really show the best work of chemicals, but those who sood in the alley and had a full view of the entire building declare the flames seemed to sink away as the chemical was applied. Garner Fire Department also arrived to offer assistance, bringing their small chemical extinguishers but did not have an opportunity to use them.

It was the greatest fire Klemme has ever had. The wind was in our favor and only a slight south wind was blowing. A heavier wind in any other direction might have been the cause of greater damage.

Greimann's Loss Large

Aaron Greimann, proprietor of Greimann Motor Company was a heavy loser. Besides the fine double front cement block building which he had recently re-modeled and that was entirely destroyed by the fire, there were also twelve cars burned up, of this number four were new Ford trucks and one new touring car, the others being a coupe, sedan, and other cars in good shape. The men saved eight cars, of which two were new cars and one new truck. Some of the cars were afire when they dragged them out. One new Fodson tractor was also destroyed, one tractor was outside and so was not damaged. About $2,400 stock of tires went up in smoke; $5,000 stock of Ford repairs and accessories, oil, grease, etc. Mr. Greimann stated yesterday that his loss would amount to practically $12,000. He was also able to save nearly all of the tools from the work shop before the fimes got to them. He did not carry any insurance on either the building or the stock.

Two individuals were also losers by the fire. Soren Jensen had his sport model Overland stored at the garage; and W. C. Keraus lost his Ford Sedan in the fire. Mr. Keraus had his car insured, but Jensen did not carry insurance.

Pool Hall Destroyed

The pool hall building was entirely destroyed by the flames and most of the contents were also lost, including pool and billiard tables, and other equipment. John Etchen, the proprietor had plenty of insurance to cover his loss on the building and contents.

Minor Losses

The Creamery building was damaged slightly fom the flames. McCullough's equipment from the barber shop was damaged some in taking it from the building. Smith also had some goods damaged in removing them from the restaurant. He received a settlement from his insurance company which covered the loss.

Greimann To Continue Business

It takes more than a fire and a big loss to put Aaron Greimann out of business. You have to hand it to him; he has a lot of ambition and is not to be buffaloed by a fire. The same morning of the fire and while smoke was still curling up from the ruins he made a deal with Henry Beier and bought the fine brick garage building now occupied by Ben Coobs.

Aaron is a clean young man and was doing a fine business when the fire wiped out his garage. He is a good businessman and said he was going to get back into business and be going stronger than ever. He will take posession of the new garage Monday, October first and says he will be on the job to give you the same good service, a square deal and courteous treatment. At the present he has his office at the Lewis Service Station and is still selling Fords.

Origin Of Fire Not Known

What started the fire is a mystery as Mr. Greimann says he had the place cleaned up good a couple of days before and made a special effort to pick up all paper, oily rags and waste and all rubbish, so that the garage was spick and span. He thinks that possibly the electric wiring became shorted in some way and the exposed wires set fire to the building under the roof.

THANK YOU

We want to thank everybody who helped us get out cars and equipment, etc., at the fire; especially thanking the fire company and all those who helped in every way.

DOES FARMER NEED COLLEGE?

"Shall I go to agricultural c or shall I stay on the farm the coming winter."

That's the question that a many Iowa boys who have fin high school and who intend to farmers are asking themselves. Will it pay we wonder to spend four years at college. Te question will be threshed out one way or the other in a good many homes within the next two weeks. This was a live question also a year ago. Statistics seem to show that in Iowa it was answered in the affirmative in the majority of cases for the attendance in agricultural courses at Ames held up better last year than was the case in most of the other agricultural institutions of the country. President R. A. Pearson of the college at Ames has dealt with the question briefly in a statement just issued.

Such times as these thru which we are passing," says Preident Pearson, "emphasize more than ever the importance of agricultural education. Not less special training for his work, but more; not less knowledge of the science of agriculture and of the principles of management, but more, are needed by th individual farmer to make the best sucss of his farming operations. One of the great problems of the day for agriculture is to reduce the cos tof production and educatin, which will help the farmer t do hat is of inestimable value to him."

FIRPO KNOCKED OUT IN SECOND

Challenger Is Given a Terrible Beating by Champion Jack Dempsey.

LATIN DOWN EIGHT TIMES

Yankee Fighter Knocked Out of Ring by "Wild Bull" From Argentine —Eighty-five Thousand Men and Women See Fight.

New York, Sept. 15.—The heavyweight championship of the world is safe for the United States. Jack Dempsey, introduced as "champion of champions," saw to that when he knocked out Luis Angel Firpo, the shaggy-headed, hairy-chested giant from the Argentine, fifty-seven seconds after the second round had begun.

Dempsey won, but in doing so he had to prove that he had all the qualities that a heavyweight champion ever had.

Firpo lost, but he proved he not only could take it, which the scoffers said he could not, but he showed that until he was beaten into insensibility, he was dangerous.

Six times in the first round Dempsey sent the challenger to the floor under a battering, savage attack of lefts and rights to the jaw.

Four times Firpo, bleeding at the mouth from the terrific punching, arose and after the fourth one, with a terrific right-hand smash to the jaw, he sent the champion flying to the floor and through the ropes.

Dempsey, groggy, but still possessing the fighting instinct that must be his by natural right, managed to scramble back into the ring as the count of four was reached. Firpo tore at him with amazing speed and ferocity for one who had a moment before been given such a terrible punching. Dempsey, his head still far from clear, covered up until he was himself again. A few seconds later the champion dropped Firpo with a right to the jaw.

As the round ended, the arena, jammed with 85,000 men and women, was in an uproar. Never in the history of heavyweight championship contests has such a first round been witnessed.

At the opening of the second round Dempsey tore after Firpo again, determined to settle the issue then and there. Once more his assault floored Firpo, and again the challenger arose. Dempsey's right suddenly landed flush on Firpo's jaw. He whirled sideways and this time fell flat on his back. He was knocked out cold, and didn't hear the referee's count. The fight ended in 57 seconds of the round.

U. S. BARS NAVY AS DRY ENFORCER

Daugherty Rules President Can Use Fleet Only When Emergency Exists.

CONGRESSIONAL O. K. NEEDED

Every Other Means Must Be Used First, Attorney General Tells Coolidge—Ruling Was Asked by Former President Harding.

Washington, Sept. 14.—The president of the United States has no authority to use the naval forces to enforce the prohibition law when no emergency exists and naval appropriations cannot be used for that purpose.

A formal opinion to this effect was given to President Coolidge by Attorney General Daugherty.

An official ruling had been asked by President Harding several months ago at the instance of Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, who wanted to use naval forces to check wholesale rum smuggling along American coasts. The opinion was delayed because of the careful examination necessitated by conflicting views in the department as to whether the President could or could not order the navy into service to catch rum runners. The coast guard of the Treasury department is conducting a coast patrol against the smugglers.

The attorney general's opinion closely followed his report to the President that enforcement had brought a tragic epoch in American history. That report has greatly increased the store of ammunition to be used by the wets in the next congress in attacking the dry law as it stands today. This is admitted on all sides.

The attorney general's opinion holds that the President possesses no authority under the Constitution or the revised statutes to employ the navy without the express authorization of congress, when no emergency exists and there exists no valid reason why a "national emergency" should be so declared by the President. Mr. Daugherty explains that there is no appropriation of money made available by congress for such purpose, and there seems to have been only one instance in the history of the country in times of peace when congress did authorize the use of naval vessels to enforce civil and criminal statutes when no emergency existed. This was in connection with the suppression of the importation of slaves.

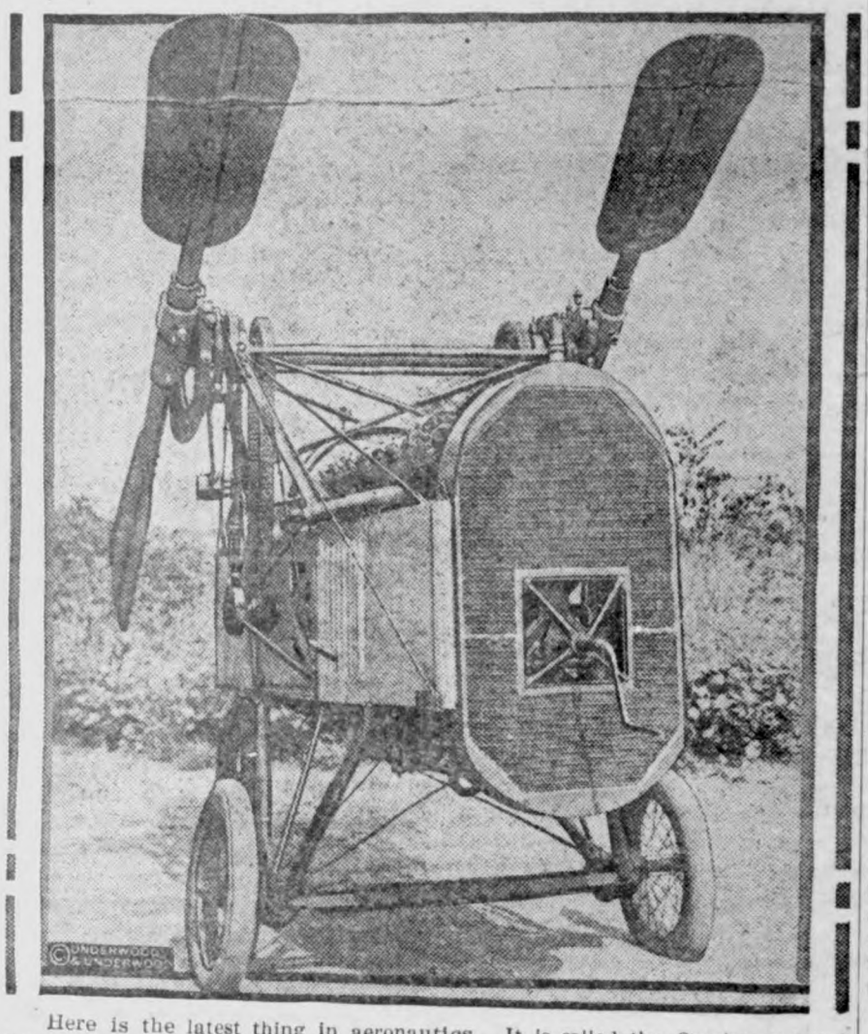
Omnivator Newest Flying Machine



Here is the latest thing in aeronautics. It is called the Omnivator and belongs to the ornithopter class. It reproduces the movement of the bird's wings in a smooth-running rotation instead of by a reciprocating action as is usual in this class of invention. The inventor, E. P. Johnson of Chicago, claims that his machine will ascend and descend vertically, go backwards and forwards, and stand still in the air without reversing the engine. The machine will be ready for its preliminary tests in a short time. It will be entered for the $250,000 prize offered by the British government for a practical vertically rising machine.

Captain Sazarac

By CHARLES TENNEY JACKSON

Picturesque days when young Creole bloods rallied around the fugitive pirate, Lafitte—he of Barataria Bay and Galveston Island—and planned the rescue of Napoleon, fretting his life away on bleak St. Helena.

This is the scene, this the big event in a romantic novel tinged with history. The last flicker of the old spirit, the last fling of those tried and trusty old pistoleers before the Yankees came and put an end to romance.

Are Your Feet Comfortable?

RELIEF from fatigue and foot troubles is not to be found in heavy shoes with stiff shanks; nor in foot appliances. Unnatural hindrances that hamper the natural functions of your feet injure your health and depress your spirits.

The flexible arch of Cantilevers is pulled up to give just the right support to the foot arch by the mere act of lacing your shoe. Your foot can exercise freely in them, too. The shoe flexes with every foot movement.

The Cantilever Shoe follows the natural lines of the foot. In it your toes are never crowded and your feet are comfortable. The style is correct for out-of-doors and for semi-formal occasions.

Of the old tin Ford everybody makes fun. They say it was made in '91. May be it was, but this I'll bet, she's good for many a long mile yet. The windshield's broken and the radiator leaks; the fan belt slips and the engine squeaks. She has shaken the screws and the nuts all loose, but I get 7 miles from a gallon of juice. When I can't get gas I burn kerosene, and sometimse I use Paris Green. Ther'es a rattle in front and a grind in the rear, and a Chinese puzzle stearing gear. Her coils are dead and her spark plugs won't fire, and her pistons are bailing wire But in spite of this she pulls me through and that's all that any car can do. The high priced cars give you tools, some extra parts and a obok of rules, but wire stretcher and a pair of shears are all I've carried fo all these years, and if I live to see the day she falls to pieces, like the One Hoss Shay, and old Hank Ford stays in the game, I'll buy another by the sme old name. —Exchange.

"The sweetestgrass is on the other side of the fence; the prettiest girls are over in the othre villiage; the best farm land is in some other community; the only chance the farm boy has is to go to the city, and the only hope for the city man to get ahead is to go to the farm." This is the belief of many people says The Farm Journal.

"Where is the best country in the whole world? Where are oppurtunities to get ahead the greatest? Where are conditions just right for sucessful farming and happy living? Where should the young man go to make the greatest sucess? The answer is easy and quickly told; he shouldn't go at all. The best opportunities, and the best people in the whole world are right at home.

"The best section of the country is the one where you reside at this moment. It has taken you half a lifetime to make your many frjends and establish your reputation for honest dealing. Your neighbors are the ones you grew up with and one old friend and neighbor is worth a multitude of strangers. The loneliest plac ein the world is in a crowd where you are unknown. Heartbreaking loneliness abides in every great city and never in the country The best land is the land you are familiar with. Eastern methods will surely fail in the west, northern methods are faiures in the suoth, and vice versa.

"Opportunities are all around you; sucess awaits you at home and not at the end of the rainbow.

Paint a stripe four inches wide and 2,196,480 feet long down the exact center was the order given a special crew started out this week by the Minnesota highway department. The stripe will be the "Center line" on 416 miles of paving on the truck highway system, to help drivers to keep to the right side. A rebuilt war truck outfit has been especially equipped for the marking work The paint feeds on a rubber tired wheel which applies it to the pavement—white paint on black pavement and black paint on white pavement. I tis expected that the ouft will mark about twenty five miles a day when he crew is experienced. The center line in intended to influence cautious drivers to travel nearer the edge of the pavement.

NO EUROPEAN WAR IN SIGHT

It may be no sign of superior virtue that the thoughts of most Europeans today are turning to peace They have had their fill of war. They are thinking more of crops than of campaigns. All this may be only the inevitable reaction from the days of terror and desolation through they were compelled to pass, but so long as it endures there will be no war involving many nations and millios of combatants. It is the warlike mind that is most dreaded, and the sanest reporters do not discover it now in Europe. The signing of the treaty with Turkey at Lausanen is one of the clearest proofs that Europe wants no more war at present. The statesman concerned would never have consented to put their names to that document unless they had been convinced that the people of their country would put up with almost anything rather than resort to arms again. So long as here is this prevailing mind to peace in Europe, peace will prevail. —New York Times.

How long will it take to double my savings at 5 per cent interest compounded semi-annually

Of the more than 11 millions of savings depositors in the United States, perhaps only a comparatively small number realize the interest earning power of their savings.

For instance: A saving fund of $500 drawing compound interest at the rate of 5 per cent will at the end of the 18 year amount to $1,140.09, without the addition of a single penny on the part of the savings depositor. Your $500 will have earned in interest, $640.09 during that period.

That is something to think about when you start a savings account for yourself or for your small son or daughter.

CAPTAIN SAZARAC

By CHARLES TENNEY JACKSON

Copyright by The Bobbs-Merrill Company

"A—BARATARIA! LAFITTE!"

"I am Lafitte again—not Monsieur Sazarac! Irons, and then the yard-arm for the first fellow who disputes my will. The older heads will not needs be told. The English woman first—after that, as it is Monsieur de Almonaster's honor to his fellow citizens of Louisiana—for Bonaparte. And then—"

"The seas are wide," grimaced Jarvis with a look at the master which drew, in turn, a glance of impenetrable reserve.

This is a stirring tale of the picturesque days when the young Creole bloods of New Orleans rallied around Lafitte—the redoubtable pirate of Barataria Bay who won imperishable fame by coming to the aid of Andrew Jackson when that red-headed warrior beat off the British at New Orleans—and planned the rescue of Napoleon from St. Helena.

"I have been hailed a hero by the city, pardoned and acclaimed for service in the new Republic, denounced again and harried from the seas, to be once more a fugitive!" says Lafitte—and chooses to come back as "Captain Sazarac," only to have his heart stirred by a lovely face—which leads him to the Plot Napoleon.

The author—Charles Tenney Jackson, has achieved a number of deservedly popular and widely-read novels. Queerly enough, though he is by birth and education a northerner, he has reproduced most wonderfully the atmosphere of those New Orleans days before the Yankee came to destroy romance—days when fair ladies were still the cause of many a duel and high gambling went with high station.

CHAPTER I

—1—

If Jean Were Here.

The affair was one in which, to its point, the young Count de Almonaster had taken the slightest interest. But now the name of his aunt, the Baroness Pontalba, was on the lips of the portly alderman of Old New Orleans; and when, in turn. Beluche, the swarthy admiral of the Cartagenian privateers, adverted to her, the languid aristocrat took with laughter.

"Ho, Monsieur Dominique! You, the fat and prosperous counselor of the American quarter who, they say, rules the city's politics even better than when were your days of piracy with Jean Lafitte—you, you, then, it was, who enticed my good aunt to giving ten thousand of the new Yankee dollars to build the house in which Napoleon is to spend his last days on the rue Chartres! And you—Beluche—for whom, even today, any flag will serve! A grand scheme, this, to rescue Bonaparte from the English! What next for us fantastic Creoles?"

"Monsieur! Not so loud, I beg! An affair of state, this, and half the gentry of Louisiana is in it. But the new American governor—eh, bien! At Washington, where the English are now so well received, it might be embarrassing—this plot—"

But De Almonaster shouted the louder. The admiral of Cartagena spluttered; the honest councilor rubbed his velvet-clad paunch and pleaded for silence. The young man's glance went from the two one-time buccaneers out the door of Maspero's exchange to the shining new plaster and green shutters of the House Napoleon; his hand went to the black silk stock at his neck to check further amusement.

Beluche—short, dark, restlessly glancing about, his black eyes narrowing as if he would be done with talk and to sea again—growled surly. Admiral of the New Granada rebels he might be, but to his old cronies of the coffee-houses he was still the Barratarian gunner who fought the pirates' battery on the right of Jackson's line at Chalmette against the British; and he made as wry a face as any of Lafitte's lieutenants when the grateful young republic of the North pardoned the buccaneers en masse.

But the worthy Alderman Dominique sighed at the younger man's jeers.

"We had thought, Monsieur, that—being of what is conceded to be the proudest family of Louisiana—you would lend generously to the plot—"

"Plot!" Again the Count Raoul mocked as he looked across the cobbles at the fresh paint upon the huge wooden shutters of the House Napoleon; he flung his jeweled fingers airily back to the shadowy tap-room: "Ho, fellow! The rum and limes! Be off with them, but tread softly—we have a plot!"

The two old adventurers gazed at the slender figure in some consternation. "Plot!" De Almonaster made the rafters ring with it: "Threescore carpenters, plasterers and whatnot, slaves and free men of color—labor all summer at this royal domicile; the very fig sellers of the Place d'Armes mewl away about it to sailormen of every sea—I, myself, across the Caribbean, or at Port Royal, am questioned as to what the bravos of New Orleans mean by this madness; and when I come home I am enticed to a public house, and whispered to of a—plot!"

"Eh, bien! It is a plot—" Old Dominique rubbed his nose. "We have the money, the ship, the spirit, the—well, everything."

"Except the emperor! Bonaparte, cooped up on his isle with England watching! Pray, good sirs—who will bell the cat?"

The admiral shrugged and tasted his limed rum of Barbadoes. The young De Almonaster heard two dolorous sighs. It was, indeed, a quiet life and a shameful pass when two worthy buccaneers of but a decade agone sat at their drink to be jibed by an incredulous aristocrat.

"Eh, well—" mumbled old Dominique absently. "If Jean were here he would go rescue Napoleon for these Creoles. Ho, old cutthroat, if the Captain Lafitte walked these streets again there would be an end to chatter! Eh, the old days! The good wine and the plunder down the Barataria passes! And I—name of God!—am now the alderman for the American quarter!"

The shadows lengthened across the cobbles to the pretentious House Napoleon. The dim front barroom of La Bourse de Maspero was quite deserted, save for a table of provincial planters from the river parishes here and there. But suddenly the drone of voices from the gaming place in the rear was cut off by a slamming door.

A man had staggered out. Tall, uncouth, of disorderly attire, not at all in the fashion, ragged at the sleeves—he stared at them with swollen eyes set in a drink-flushed face. The empty scabbard of a small sword rattled at his muddy boot-tops; his silken-lined cloak and round velvet cap gave him the aspect of a rather solemn and nervous poseur.

"Devil take the dice!" He saw the elegant De Almonaster, and came briskly nearer: "Back with me, Raoul—watch! An affair, Raoul, that will call me out to the Oaks sleepy-eyed some morning this week. The stranger, Sazarac, has the English colonel bewitched. A Sazarac!—I wish something more than drink could draw all eyes to me! A pistoling fellow, eh bien!"

John Jarvis thrust his blinking eyes nearer: "A rapier bully, Messieurs—

"A Grand Scheme, This, to Rescue Bonaparte From the English! What Next for Us Fantastic Creoles?"

such as this Sazarac . . . there's a woman in it without doubt."

The town's first bohemian of the arts and letters, a graceless scribbler, painter—wastrel of the wine-shops, for all he was the nephew of the great John Wesley in England. He slept, worked and ate in a dirty studio up on the rue Conti, where, unknown as yet to the world, there labored a young assistant who painted backgrounds for Jarvis' portraits, but who was destined for fame when the gamesters and politicians of the New Orleans of 1821 had been long forgotten—Monsieur Audubon, but lately arrived from the Indies.

Jarvis tipped the table for a drink, looking about to see who might pay the score. "Pistols—" he grunted. "I trust this Sazarac wings the Britisher at least, though if he does, I shall see liquor from his veins and not blood. The fellow can drink more than I, which is intolerable. It reflects on my reputation. . . . I shall challenge, myself, if Sazarac does not!"

"They are to fight?" queried De Almonaster languidly.

"They will. I know the course of these affairs. I attend them all, Raoul. I am the black buzzard who is earliest to roost at the Dueling Oaks and wish them bad luck—all."

The first bohemian of the Vieux Carre rubbed his nose: "Another drink, Monsieur? Wait—we shall go in presently when the affair becomes provocative. This Sazarac has a steady eye, and Colonel Carr is bent upon an insult."

De Almonaster shrugged his distaste: "I was speaking of the new sugar process at Monsieur Bore's—"

"Oh, no!" returned Jarvis airily. "You were discussing the plot. Why sit with Dominique, the alderman, and Beluche, the admiral, save upon our nice intrigue? Ho!" he roared suddenly, so that the glasses quivered: "Be discreet!—our plot Napoleon!"

The two former buccaneers looked wryly at him. "The devil take you, Jarvis," growled Beluche. "It was of old days, and our vanished captain. You, yourself, whom Jean rescued from perdition once—"

"The plot!" shouted Jarvis so loudly that even bystanders across the cobbled way looked into the shadowy portals of Maspero's. "Ah, I am going to my studio, gentlemen! I have an idea! My new assistant is very clever at painting birds—Monsieur Audubon is crazy to paint birds! He sprinkles salt on their tails to catch them. Now I shall take our plot to the studio, and Monsieur Audubon shall paint salt upon it to catch the Emperor Napoleon."

The two worthies glowered upon him. De Almonaster's idle laugh rang out. He, too, arose with Jarvis, and the latter could not resist a last gibe at his cronies. "The alderman and the admiral—and in the one picture that I cared about, done down at Lafitte's red fort before the Americans plundered it, I had the bad taste to paint them in with my captain! What a downfall!—from piracy to politics for Dominique; and old Beluche blustering about having a lawful commission!" He put an unsteady finger on the laughing De Almonaster's sleeve: "Come on, Raoul! There is no more romance since Lafitte abandoned the town to the steamboat Yankees; and yet, last evening, upon the Esplanade, I saw a woman's face. I—Raoul—unshaven, dirty, idle—looked back at her coach. I, Raoul—hanging to a lamppost—made her smile!"

De Almonaster motioned the jester toward the gaming rooms. "The lady who arrived with the British colonel's party? Of course—I am told she had the gallants astir when she drove."

Jarvis nodded absently: "They are wishing no bad luck to Colonel Carr beyond that this Sazarac shoots him tomorrow at the Oaks. Eh, well—come!"

From the door they could see the throng in La Bourse de Maspero. The wide door of the small room was packed with silent, attentive youths.

Jarvis twitched the coat of the nearest. "What has happened, De Marigny? Is the devil still dicing as to which to take?"

"Carr loses steadily." Young Marigny had but recently attained fame by naming a street of the Faubourg Marigny—his patrimony now being cut into lots and sold to the insatiable Americans outside the city walls—"Rue de Bagatelle," to commemorate his losses at the game. He therefore parted the skirts of his bottle-green coat, thrust his hands upon his breeches of snow-white leather and tapped them significantly: "A ruined man. Eh, bien! The British consul, Langhorne, protested, seemingly very uncomfortable at Colonel Carr's insistence at play with this Captain Sazarac, who, it is said, is a mere professional gambler of the river packets with the manners of a gentleman. I will say he has acted so—he tried in every way to avoid Carr's game, but it appears that the British officer involved himself badly on the way from St. Louis."

"How then?" ventured De Almonaster. "A professional gamester at Maspero's?"

"Carr, himself, introduced the fellow; the game must continue," young De Marigny shrugged; "and there is talk of some affair of women between the two!"

"The lady who looked back from her coach—" mused Jarvis to himself. "I must get me a new waistcoat."

A massive silver candelabrum cast a ruby light upon the cloth about which sat a quartette. Langhorne, His Majesty's consul; a dealer of Maspero's; Colonel Carr of the newly arrived British mission en route to the Mexicoes; and the stranger from the West.

"Sazarac—" muttered De Marigny, "whose fame at the cards has overleaped the town in one night. Mark him, Raoul!—a peruke, whitened as silver! Where has the fellow been these years as to know not the fashions?"

"Three thousand dollars on the red against the bond girl!"

Argentina.

Argentina, or the Argentine Republic, has an area of 1,135,840 square miles and a population of about 7,500,000. The resources include forests of hardwood in the north, pine forests in the Andes region; coal is found; but the chief sources of wealth are agriculture and the pastures. Large numbers of sheep and cattle are raised; dairying is important, and the chief crops are wheat, linseed, oats, barley, rye, and Indian corn. In some parts sugar cane and fruits are cultivated.

STOP BUILDING AIR CRAFT

American Legion to Recommend International Disarmament Conference —Conduct National Referendum.

An international air disarmament conference to stop the present air construction race will be recommended by the American Legion, which will conduct a national referendum to obtain the views of prominent Americans as to the advisability of such a conference.

All members of congress, governors of all states, 1,000 editors, 100 college presidents and a number of prominent citizens will be asked by the Legion to express an opinion on the proposal which would involve the holding of a meeting in Washington, similar to the naval disarmament conference, to be attended by representatives of all leading world powers for the purpose of reaching some agreement as to the number of fighting and observation planes to be maintained by each.

If the opinion of the national leaders is favorable to the Legion's project, President Coolidge will be asked to call an international conference. A necessity for immediate action in the matter of limitation of air armament exists since France took the lead in an air-construction program, and the remaining European powers have entered the mad race to overtake the French. France at the present time has 140 squadrons of the military machines and plans to have 220 at the end of 1925. The planes will carry 75-millimeter cannons and will also be used to transport six machine guns and their crews. The plans include machines which will serve as actual troopships of the air.

England is the nearest competitor, having appropriated $27,500,000 to enlarge her air armada. It has been estimated that by 1926 England will be able to send aloft only 624 battle machines in comparison with France's 1,530 air fighters. Italy and Russia have actively entered the race, the latter planning to have 10,000 planes in operation.

A statement issued recently by National Commander Alvin Owsley calls attention to the fact that naval and land forces have been reduced by national agreement and that the Legion proposes to attempt to obtain similar measures governing aircraft.

"The crying need of the world today is peace—industrial, commercial, economic peace—a restoration from the ravages and horrors of war, a settling down and getting back to the sane pursuits of industry, quietude of heart and mind, to live in safe seclusion away from the covetousness of the invader," the statement reads.

"Can we of the Legion who were their comrades in arms not ask the nations to pause and see what they are doing? Preparedness in a larger sense means a temptation to use that which is being prepared to fight. The wounds of the last titanic trouble are still gaping open; the life blood of the nations is still pouring out because of too much preparedness for battle.

"I propose to the world preparedness for peace—a coming together in a great world conference for the limitation of airplanes for war instead of war to destruction. I challenge the right of any nation to prepare any instrument of destruction and claim the name of defender of world peace. Peace will come when the people of the world will to have peace and express their will in solemn declaration and covenant sealed with honor.

"America is ready to lead the way to secure peace in the air and she has gone far by example to make war impossible on land and sea."

DRAWING CLOSER TO LEGION

Public Is More Interested in Members of Organization, Commander Owsley Believes.

The American public is drawing closer to the American Legion in the opinion of Alvin Owsley, Legion national commander, who has recently completed a speaking tour which carried him into eight states, Cuba and Panama.

"I believe the people are more interested in the question of disabled veterans obtaining ample hospitals and sanatoriums for the sick and wounded than they ever were before," he said. "They are beginning to understand that the first duty of the United States is to care for these defenders."

Commander Owsley said that the stand of the Legion for exclusion of immigrants and in opposition to those who preach radical doctrines had found immediate response.

Other Legion policies which were met with favor by the public, he said, were the stand for a universal draft act, under which capital and labor and all the resources of America would be called for national defense; support of the action of the French and Belgian troops in occupying the Ruhr, and war on profiteers.

Declaring that the Legion members are rising to responsible positions in the state and nation, Commander Owsley pointed out that three governors, four lieutenant-governors, four United States senators and more than thirty members of the lower house in the congress are members of the Legion

WHO'S WHO—and WHEREFORE

Allister Tires of Waiting at the Church

If the totally unpredictable Miss Mary Landon Baker, society beauty of Chicago, has intended to go on indefinitely picking petals from a daisy to the tune of "I will, I won't, I will, I won't marry Allister McCormick," a cable dispatch that came from Paris the other day promises to save the daisy from further mutilation. Here's the dispatch:

"The engagement of Allister McCormick of Chicago to Miss Joan Stevens of London soon is to be announced, according to a dispatch from Le Touquet to the Herald. The wedding, it is said, probably will take place in Paris early in October."

Miss Baker let the bridegroom-to-be and the wedding guests cool their heels in a Chicago church the first time she postponed the ceremony. Since then she has been a real boon to the society reporters, while the fashionable world of two hemispheres has been kept guessing. The mystery as to why Miss Baker repeatedly prepared to marry McCormick, always backing out at the last moment, never has been dispelled.

Lord Birkenhead Stirs Up Much Comment

Viscount Birkenhead, who is better known here as Sir Frederick E. Smith, the British attorney general who prosecuted Sir Roger Casement for treason, stirred up much newspaper comment by his first public address in America. Henry Breckenridge, assistant secretary of war in the Wilson administration, started the ball by this letter to John W. Davis, president of the American Bar association:

"Permit me to refer to the impudent references to ex-President Wilson in Lord Birkenhead's speech before the Institute of Politics at Williamstown. As a member of the American Bar association I regret that any one with so little sense of propriety has been invited to address its annual convention. If it proves necessary for him to fulfill his engagement to speak I hope it may be intimated to him that the expression of such opinions concerning a great American statesman is distasteful and intolerable to any self-respecting American audience."

The former lord chancellor of England made this reference among others: "President Wilson, indeed, came with a noble message of hope; but unhappily in the sequel hope proved to be his principal equipment. It is a fascinating speculation whether, had he been given health and strength to pursue the campaign which he contemplated, his idealism and personality could have affected the forces of the world. I am bold enough, even at the moment when I pay the highest tribute to his unselfish motives, to doubt it."

The speaker declared that self-interest alone should determine whether the United States should intervene in the affairs of Europe.

Secretary Mellon's Ideas on Europe

Secretary of the Treasury Mellon signalized his return from Europe by causing it to be known that he had definitely decided to remain in the cabinet, at the request of President Coolidge. He also made report to the President on conditions in Europe, based on the information secured in a trip of six weeks. Secretary Mellon is chairman of the American World war foreign debt commission and one of the very rich men of the world, with many interests. His conclusions include these:

France is prosperous, although her policy is weakening her credit.

England fears for the future of world trade and blames the deadlock in the Ruhr.

Germany confronts the prospect of communistic uprisings and the disintegration of the empire, but could still function if permitted to do so.

There is not a gleam of light looking toward a solution of the reparations controversy, but the problem must be worked out. The settlement of the Ruhr deadlock will remove the last obstacle in the way of a general improvement.

There is nothing the United States can do now or could have done to bring about a solution, which must be worked out by the people immediately involved.

Gen. March on World-Wide Honeymoon

Maj. Gen. Peyton C. March surprised his friends by marrying in London Miss Cora Virginia McEntee of New York city. The bride is twenty-six, thirty-two years younger than her husband. General March said he met his bride three years ago in Rome, where she was studying music and languages.

"After a tour of the English seaside resorts," said General March, "we may leave England and tour the continent, and will probably return to the United States by way of Asia, thus completing a tour of the world. It will be an extended honeymoon."

General March's first wife was Mrs. Josephine Smith Cunningham of Washington, whom he married in 1891. She died in 1904. General March has three daughters and one son living. The daughters are Mrs. John Milliken, Mrs. Paul R. Frank and Mrs. Joseph M. Swing. All three were married to army officers. The living son is Lewis March. General March's elder son, Peyton C. March, Jr., was killed in an airplane crash in the war.

General March was made chief of staff of the United States army in 1918; he had been artillery commander of the expeditionary forces. Resigning his commission March 5, 1921, he was placed on the retired list November 1, 1921.

Every Gallon Of This Paint Is Equal To Five Quarts

Do you believe you can get 5 quarts out of a 4 quart can? Isn't it true that some get 9 miles out of a gallon of gas, while others get 15? It's not the number of gallons of gas put in the tank, that counts. It's the number of miles that come out of it.

It's exactly the same with paint. If this paint we sell will go 25% farther than most paint, isn't it exactly the same as if you had 5 quarts in every one of your gallons? Haven't room here to tell you why this paint we sell, goes so far, but if you'll drop in we will gladly give you the convincing facts.

Motor Wear and Car Life--

It's generally the condition of the motor that determines car life for the Car Owner. This condition is the basis for his judgement of the car and its possible future life. That's why there s such a tremendous market for Motor Re-conditioning.

Motor condition and satisfaction is judged largely by the condition and operation of three of its units,—the piston rings, pistons and piston pins. Wear of these three units is the most general cause ofpower loss, fuel waste and oil troubles.

But real Motor Re-conditioning must start at the foundation of the motor—the cylinder block. It, too, has been worn by the pistons and rings until in most cars which have been driven 10,000 miles or more the cylinders are somewhat out of round.

The cylinder casting itself in a car which has run 10,000 miles or more is better than the day it was firstused. Cast iron "sets" with age. The cylinder block itself has actually improved with use. But the close adjustments and fits—the thousandth and half thousandth of an inch clearances in the motor's moving parts—cannot be restored with the new parts unless the cylinders themselves are re-conditioned. They must be brought back to the accurate dimensions they were when the car was new.

English II Class visits Times Office

Last Friday the English II class, under the direction of Miss Stacey, had a rather interesing experience. During their class period they all went to the Times Office where the Editor explained, as well as he could in the short time, a few of the things about printing. He explained the point system and different kinds and sizes of type, also demonstrated the Linotype, Cylinder Press and Job press, and incidently he showed one or two members "type lice". This of course was all very interesting o the class. Here is what one student wrote of the visit,

"Friday morning between 9:10 9:50 the Sophomore class made a visit to Mr. Jorgenson's Printing Office. When we entered the office, Mr. Jorgenson showed us a diagram of a cross where he letters N. E. W. S. were placed. These letters mark the origin of the word news, and also the four principle directions. Then he showed us the different forms of type, which are used in printing. These forms vary from a six point to a seventy two point. The eight point is mostly used in medium printing. For large print in advertising the seventy-two point is used.

Then we looked at his Linotype machine, and saw how the type is melted in a large melting pot.

Then we went in the basement and looked at his large paper stamping machine. Then we saw a smaller machine used for the stamping of advertisements.

We enjoyed the visit very much and we felt it was a great help and benefit to us all.

Assembly Mornings

No Advanced Orchestra Class

Thursday evening the would-be players of the School orchestra met in the High School Assembly room to talk things over. The High school players who would have been in this would have received one credit at the end of the year. The outsiders who would have been in the orchestra were to deposit a sum of $5.00 as a forfeit, 25c would be taken off at each absence. The remainder would be given back at the end of the year.

The ousider's would not agree to this proposition, and the orchestra is no more.

We are sorry this there will be no school orchestra, but we trust that the Beginner's orchestra will soon be able o squeak and give us a little music.

What's Been Going on it Iowa's Industry the Past Week

KLEMME IN NEED OF BETTER FIRE FIGHTING EQUIPMENT

DRY MATTER, THERE'S RUB

Soft Corn Good Feed But is Short on Dry Matter; Swine Handle it Well

Present conditions seem to indicate that there will be sof corn in Iowa this fall. Granting this, there is little need for worry for practically all the tests conducted at the Iowa Experiment Station have shown that the dry matter in soft corn is about equal to the dry matter of mature corn. The chief difference is in the amount of dry matter contained in a bushel, accord ing to the animal husbandry men at Iowa State College. Soft corn that runs as high as fifty per cent moisture contains only 28 pounds of dry matter per buschel while old corn on 10 per cent moisture basis, which is below normal, would contain 50.4 pounds of dry matter per bushel.

It is surprising how well swine handle soft and immature corn, say the experimenters.

If soft corn is worth 40 cents per bushel on the above basis, old corn would be worth 72 cents per bushel, But, according to the animal husbandry department, soft corn runs anywhere from 30 to 65 per cent water in the corn grain. For this reason there is a large variety of soft corn and calculations must be made carefully.

But there is yet another difference between soft corn and that which is fully matured. Soft corn requires a little supplement in the form of tankage that does mature corn. This is shown in the results of an experiment completed at the experiment station by John M. Evvard. Tankage re 100 pounds gain with old corn was 20.8 pounds and with the new corn the amount was 32.2 pounds. It took less dry matter in the form of new corn to produce 100 pounds of gain than it did on old corn.

A FEW FACTS ABOUT SNAKES

Iowa has twenty-five kinds of native snakes, and only two of them can hurt you, according to information to be contained in a bulletin which is being prepared by Dr. J. E. Duthrie, of the zoology department at Iowa State College. The subject of the bulletin is to be "Iowa Snakes."

"Iowa has about twenty-five different kinds of snakes," Dr. Duthrie says. "Some of them, such as the bullsnake which catches ground squirrels; the fox snake, milk snake and king snake which are valuable in controlling rats and mice; and the blue racer, which eats mice, moles, crickets and grasshoppers. are valuable and should be protected.

Contrary to the general belief, only two classes of Iowa snakes are poisonous, the bulletin says. These are the prairie and timber rattlesnakes. All other so-called poisonous snakes are entirely harmless.

The common garter snake and water snakes are of little, if any, economic importance. Water snakes sometimes become pests, because they make a practice of feeding on fish.

Some snakes are born alive, while others are hatched from eggs. The females produce from six to fifty young a year.

The largest snake to be found in this state is the bull-snake, which sometimes grows to a length of ten fee. The smallest species are the red-bellied snake and the Virginia snake, which are less than ten inches in length.

ne of the unusual habits of which the bulletin will tell the position in which they elves when they hibernate er. They roll themselves hich will contain up- n individual snakes, others warmth to ring the winter

WHAT THE NEIGHBORS SAID ABOUT THE FIRE

Short Clippings From Nearby Newspapers; All Say Chemicals Do Good Work

A number of Belmond people drove up to view the blaze, and the Belmond Fire Department, which was called upon for help, sent up the truck and several firemen who did very good work.—Belmond Independent.

The supply of water was not sufficient to cope with a disastrous fire. Neither is the apparatus as good as the town needs. Had there been a chemical outfit there when the fire was discovered the loss would probably have amounted to but little. As there was none the loss is several times the cost of a chemical engine. Other towns should profit by Mr. Greiman's misfortune.—Garner Signal.

Belmond and Garner fire companies were called to the rescue and managed to give aid to the Klemme fire department and save adjoining property.—Britt News Tribune.

The town of Klemme suffered a very serious fire loss last Friday morning when a large garage and one or two other buildings were burned down. Some of the Belmond fire company responded to a call for help and went up to Klemme helping to bring the fire under control. —Belmond Herald-Press.

Klemme's experience Friday of last week should be a warning to the people of Garner. Experience has taught people that water pressure, though it be ever so strong and dependable, is not always what is most needed in fighting fire, and as a result, most towns in this section are supplied with a chemical truck. Had Klemme an apparatus of this character, her great loss of Friday would have been greatly reduced if not entirely eliminated. Nearly every fire starting in the smaller towns could be nipped before it gets a start with the use of a chemical engine. and the big loss invariably sustained by water soaking, eliminated. Garner has no chemical equipment. but she should have. * * * It could be used, too, in combating farm fires. * * * * * *

Klemme's fire fighting equipment has been considered quite equal to the town's needs but this theory has been exploded. As a matter of fact, the throwing of water upon a fire where there is oil, only helps spread the blaze. A call for help was put in for Garner and Belmond, as it looked for a time as though the entire block in which the garage was located would go. Garner had no equipment that could be made use ful to our neighbor, but the local fire boys did collect from the various places of business of our city the small extinguishers which nearly all the places have, and took them to Klemme. However, the Belmond Chemical Truck had arrived in advance of the Garner contingent and within a short time. had the fire well under control.—Garner Leader.

According to the above clippings, it seems to be the general view that chemicals are a great help in combating fires. We would like to see the town council take some favorable action toward buying a chemical truck for Klemme. It is certainly needed here.

In fact, the town council passed a motion to buy an outfit early this summer and we might again suggest that they get busy. They met on the night of June 11, 1923 and made the following motion:

"Motion made and seconded that the town of Klemme, Iowa, purchase a new Ford truck chassis; two thirty five gallon chemical tanks, and other equipment necessary for the building of a fire truck. Motion carried."

Over three months have now passed since the council made the above motion. Isn't it about time for them to show a little action?

The first shall be last and the last shall be first—from the table to the grave.

NAVAL AID WANTS BIG BATTLESHIPS

Captain McNamee Says Planes Cannot Protect the United States.

CITES RESULTING DANGERS

Opposes Vigorously the Movement for Supplanting War Vessels With Fighting Air Craft—Points to Short Life of Airships.

Washington, Sept. 22.—The United States navy must be built around a battleship rather than the airplane, Capt. Luke McNamee, U. S. N., director of naval intelligence maintained in an address here.

He spoke for "a navy that can stand up and take blows and hit back harder than the other fellow, a navy with battleships and airplanes." The way to win wars, he pointed out, "is to go after the other fellow and hit him where he lives."

Captain McNamee emphasized the view that the United States could not hope to win a war "by sitting at home on the defensive," even on the precarious assumption that airplanes might be able to protect American continental shores.

It would be essential, he said, to bring "military pressure to bear against the enemy to compel him to accept peace or give up our possessions."

If the United States had no navy, but relied solely on a huge air force, according to Captain McNamee, an enemy could capture Panama, Porto Rico, Alaska, the Philippines, the Virgin islands, Hawaii, Guam and Samoa because he "would sink every transport that we sent out with reinforcements for any of those places."

No defense, he asserted, can exist indefinitely if it cannot be reinforced.

Captain McNamee maintained there had been "much misconception in regard to economy in using aircraft instead of battleships."

"Despite expenditures on aircraft of more than $1,800,000,000 since 1917," he said, "we have not today one-tenth of the aircraft we would need to enter war tomorrow.

"This is due to the short life of aircraft, the high cost of development and the frequency of crashes and operating casualties."

MAY OUST GOVERNOR

Call Issued for Special Session of Oklahoma Legislature.

Members to Defy Executive—More Than a Score of Charges Are Made Against Walton.

Oklahoma City, Okla., Sept. 20.—More than a score of specific charges alleging that Gov. J. C. Walton has misused his official powers are enumerated in a call for a special session of the lower house of the Oklahoma legislature, copies of which were made public here.

The call was made public at this time, it was stated, because of reports that Governor Walton and Murray F. Gibbons, speaker of the house, were planning to issue a call of their own.

The call issued by the legislators says:

"For a long time the people of our state have been patiently suffering and enduring from charges and countercharges of certain conditions in the state and it is now our belief that the time has come when it is necessary to investigate such conditions and charges in order that the people may know the truth, which alone can make them free.

"The administration of the present governor of the state of Oklahoma, if charges that are openly made against him are true, is one of repeated injuries, usurpations, and blunders, evidencing the direct object of establishing an absolute tyranny and despotism over this commonwealth.

"To prove or disprove this, let a full investigation be made and submitted to the people of the state of Oklahoma."

GOLD CAUSES BERLIN PANIC

New Dictator's Drive Triples the Value of Germany's Paper Money.

EFFORT MAKES CITY BEDLAM

Great Wailing and Gnashing of Teeth Throughout Nation — Thousands Lose Fortunes While Millions Double Holdings.

Berlin, Sept. 21.—There is a great wailing and gnashing of teeth throughout the nation. Thousands of persons lost fortunes and millions doubled their holdings. Americans who have made debts or whose hotel rooms cost marks are in consternation. From Wednesday's 250,000,000 marks for a dollar, the mark Thursday night closed at 80,000,000 to a dollar.

The enormous success of Germany's exchange coup is credited to Finance Dictator Fellinger, who is said to have ordered marks bought in New York, Amsterdam and Switzerland. Although Germany has issued quadrillions of marks—trillions daily—it was possible with a mere million gold marks to retire one-fifth of the nation's gold mark obligations.

German speculators, who were clamoring for dollars and were given all they could stomach by the reichsbank, must produce trillions of paper marks or they are bankrupt. Panic is reigning. If the finance dictator can dictate the rate a few days, there will be a most serious catastrophe for speculators.

Meanwhile, Americans find food, hotel and goods prices, which already are above the world marks, suddenly tripled. At the new rate everything will cost from double to five times American prices.

The government's offer to France and Belgium, made in personal conversations and not in official notes, includes a statement of its willingness to discuss reparations and re-establish the prewar conditions of production in the Ruhr. A few things are asked in return, such as freeing political prisoners, which is merely done to save the government's face in front of the terrific nationalist and monarchist attack.

Buy Your Tires from a Firestone DEALER

At the Latest Prices—The Lowest in History

You will find the Firestone Dealer one of the stable business men of your community. He offers a clean, fresh stock, backed by a well organized service. He wants you as a permanent customer.

That is the reason he sells Firestone tires. He knows and has plenty of proof that they are the best tires on the market. He can give you the greatest value and thereby retain your trade for years.

Every day you find new proof of this unequalled value. On the 15th of this month, Firestone Tires set two new dirt track records at Syracuse when Tommy Milton slid around four turns at every mile and covered the 100 miles in 75 minutes, 33 hundredths seconds. He also established a new world's record for one mile by covering it in 42 and 28 hundredths seconds. The next four cars to finish were also equipped with Firestone Gum-Dipped Cords. Each one of them went the entire race without a stop. This and every other important race this year was won on Firestone Gum-Dipped Cords and Steam-Welded Tubes. Such performance gives you conclusive proof of their strength and durability.

Not only do race drivers use Firestone Tires as protection to their lives and the surest way to victory, but the largest tire buyers in the world insist on and buy Firestone Tires for economy and service. These buyers include the leading car manufacturers, the biggest commercial car operators and the taxicab and motorbus operators. 57,639,714 tire miles were sold to taxicab and motorbus operators in the month of August.

Think this over. You cannot afford to accept anything less than Firestone service and economy. You can buy this service and economy from any of the dealers listed below.

How long will it take to double my savings at 5 per cent interest compounded semi-annually

Of the more than 11 millions of savings depositors in the United States, perhaps only a comparatively small number realize the interest earning power of their savings.

For instance: A saving fund of $500 drawing compound interest at the rate of 5 per cent will at the end of the 18 year amount to $1,140.09, without the addition of a single penny on the part of the savings depositor. Your $500 will have earned in interest, $640.09 during that period.

That is something to think about when you start a savings account for yourself or for your small son or daughter.

Motor Wear and Car Life--

It's generally the condition of the motor that determines car life for the Car Owner. This condition is the basis for his judgement of the car and its possible future life. That's why there s such a tremendous market for Motor Re-conditioning.

Motor condition and satisfaction is judged largely by the condition and operation of three of its units,—the piston rings, pistons and piston pins. Wear of these three units is the most general cause ofpower loss, fuel waste and oil troubles.

But real Motor Re-conditioning must start at the foundation of the motor—the cylinder block. It, too, has been worn by the pistons and rings until in most cars which have been driven 10,000 miles or more the cylinders are somewhat out of round.

The cylinder casting itself in a car which has run 10,000 miles or more is better than the day it was firstused. Cast iron "sets" with age. The cylinder block itself has actually improved with use. But the close adjustments and fits—the thousandth and half thousandth of an inch clearances in the motor's moving parts—cannot be restored with the new parts unless the cylinders themselves are re-conditioned. They must be brought back to the accurate dimensions they were when the car was new.

Transportation at Bargain Prices

LAST year the Rock Island System received an average rate of ONE AND ONE-THIRD CENTS for hauling a ton of freight one mile.

It furnished the cars, tracks, roadbed, bridges, locomotives, coal, trackmen, accountants, depots, superintendents, repair forces, dispatchers and trainmen and received just about the price of a stick of chewing gum!

Out of this 1 1-3 cents the railroad had to meet wages, taxes, coal bills, materials, repairs, loss and damage claims, interest on borrowed money, depreciation.

You don't have to know anything about "valuation" or other high sounding words tossed about on political platforms to be able to see at a glance that this charge is low for what you get for it.

Do you know any other easily available form of transportation so cheap? It costs you more than this to run your automobile a mile.

The Rock Island is far more than the two steel tracks and depot you see at your station. It is your friend honestly trying to serve you well. It is a great institution of 8,000 miles whose facilities are necessary to your community and to the nation's business.

It has no magic source of funds. It cannot get money out of the air. Like any other business, it must earn its way to keep going.

And it must do it on one and one-third cents received for handling that ton of freight a mile.

Night and day the Rock Island is engaged in the people's service. It is your neighbor and helper.

CAPTAIN SAZARAC

"THE CAPTAIN JEAN!"

SYNOPSIS—Under the name of "Captain Sazarac," and disguised, Jean Lafitte, former freebooter of Barataria, proscribed, returns to the city of New Orleans. He is recognized by two of his old companions, Alderman Dominique and Beluche. At the gaming tables Sazarac has won much money from Colonel Carr, British officer. John Jarvis, the city's first bohemian of the arts and letters, an old-time friend of Lafitte, tells of a woman's face and smile.

The stranger's face was all but erted. The profile gave the impres- of utter obliviousness to the owded room. His English small- thes were rather passe for the pe- d; and the powdered hair above a of blue broadcloth, his buff eches, and silk stockings thrust o low silver-buckled shoes gave a int distinction to his tall figure. two young men watched his ozed hand turning a card under ruby light. After a moment Jar- yawned audibly; and then a nudge between him and the Count de naster. They looked down upon short, stout form of Dominique, alderman. Behind him peered he, the restless seaman of Car- a.

e artist strolled again to the bar- . Not even the buzz of interest followed a violent exclamation in cardroom lured him again from cognac. But Dominique, the alder- , had started to his tiptoes with curious glance at his fellow-buc- er. "A voice?" he whispered, and ed past the onlookers.

he British officer, flushed with k and chagrin, had leaned closer his opponent. "Do you question my d, sir, as to the worth of the ch? Put her upon the block at Rotunda tomorrow! She would three thousand dollars at rleston; and in this town, sir, if will find a fairer one—slave, or woman of color—or even among reputed beauties—" here was a stir; the Creole gentle- glanced at one another darkling. ghorne, the consul, raised his d, but Sazarac had answered ly:

Your pardon, sir. I did not know —the—she was a chattel. I own slaves, sir, nor do I care to wager one."

You shall play on, sir. You have ed my fortunes on this river voy- and in last night's play! I de- d my chance at retrieving. You e just accepted my two horses in dge. Now, then—this San Domingo , upon the card, sir?"

Sazarac gathered the long rough rout about his shoulders as if to se. The consul whispered to the -faced Carr. The dealer sat back h a glance at the circle of faces.

"You cannot leave!" Carr cried rsely. He turned to those behind : "Gentlemen! Is it customary, New Orleans, for a loser to be re- ed any legitimate wager that may nstate him?"

There was a murmur; it was the e at Maspero's. The stranger must ow. De Marigny whispered: "He s Sazarac there. The stranger must y!"

The stranger glanced about. Carr ruck the table violently.

"It is my privilege, gentlemen! A rd, sir! The turn of one card, in- ead of running the deal! No chance, en, for trickery!"

The stillness became acute. It was bad word at Maspero's. De Marigny pected the next instant to see the known gamester fling his glove into rr's face. But the quiet profile did change. Langhorne clucked in his oat as if the situation were intol- rable—as if, indeed, more portentous ings than a slave girl hung on the rn of the card.

"The card, then—" Sazarac went on owly. "Three thousand dollars on e red against the bond girl."

"Taken—" Carr bowed. "The black ill turn, gentlemen!"

The dealer threw the cards in a emicircle across the cloth. Deliber- tely, but with a flash of his white ngers, he picked one at random and rned it up.

It was the ace of hearts.

The groups watched it curiously. aptain Sazarac arose, threw his oak higher about his face, although he day was warm, and turned to go. he dealer, at a gesture from him, ept the notes and gold upon the oth, into a leather bag. The groups oke up with a comment here and here; the gentlemen by the door gave ay to the stranger as he advanced.

Colonel Carr had started sullenly at is abrupt dismissal by his victorious pponent. Whatever wild word was pon the ruined man's lips was hecked by the consul's muttered arning. But Carr, too, arose, fol- owing a pace to growl over the crowd at the door.

"The girl, sir, will be at your dis- osal at the hotel at whatever hour you claim your property!"

The stranger bowed. Out in the oking-room he seemed like one con- cious that the eyes of all New Or- ans' men of affairs were upon him. ut outside the door he stopped ab- uptly. In the shadow of the arched oorway of St. Louis street two mall, short figures, their heads to- gether, their arms gesticulating wild- ly, were vainly trying each to quiet the other.

"You know it is!" gasped the wor- thy alderman, holding his side. "By the Lord!—I am not fooled—no, no! Shaven as a priest, his hair whited as an English squire's—muffled by stock and peruke—no, nothing deceives these old eyes of mine!"

"Thou d—d fool—silence!" whis- pered the swarthy admiral of Carta- gena. "Is there not still a price upon his head—an added price since he re- nounced the President's pardon, and involved himself in that affair of Gal- veston island? Spanish, English—the Americans, too—they would hound him to the gallows!"

The tall cloaked figure was passing. Twenty paces away, the entrance to La Bourse de la Maspero was filled with watching burghers.

And from them all a young man had advanced smilingly. In his full- skirted green coat and shining white breeches held within his polished Hes- sian boots, the young Count de Almo- naster bowed gracefully and extended a hand all but hidden by his beruffled cuff.

"At the green room of Maspero's, sir, none play save those to whom New Orleans extends its hospitality. If, perchance, at any time, the name of a gentleman could serve in a pos- sible affair, I am the grandson of Don Almonaster y Roxas."

"I thank you, Monsieur." The stranger extended his own. "I am Captain Gaspar Sazarac, recently on service with the United States explo- rations in the West." He shrugged smilingly: "I thank you, Monsieur."

He turned and met again two eld- erly men who stared unbelievingly. Then the gold-laced admiral of Car- tagena placed hand upon his shoulder.

"Behold us!" he whispered. "I—Beluche—and this, old Dominique! Dogs of old days and green seas! And you—the Captain Jean!"

The stranger gazed at them ques- tionly. "It may be," he mused, "that after the heat is done, I shall take the air upon the levee by the old Fort St. Louis. The gentry do not promenade just there, I believe."

Before the eyes of the watching burghers at the coffee house he saun- tered down the cobbles of the rue Chartres. The fat and honest alder- man muttered; and then, at a laugh from the young count, he turned to stare fiercely at him.

"I shall take the air upon the levee myself, sirs," smiled Raoul. "Ho, Dominique! Do not fail your cap- tain!"

CHAPTER II

A Ship for a Pirate's Eye.

It was dusk when Raoul de Almo- naster sauntered along the moldering brick parapet of the little pentagonal fort that marked the upper river junction of the dismantled city wall with the green-scummed moat built to de- fend the landward side. Along the inner levee face he presently saw what he had come to see. Dominique, the honorable councilor of the city, and the resplendent admiral of the re- public of Cartagena, even now fight- ing for its life against the king o' Spain's men across the Caribbean sea.

"Well, I Am Lafitte. I Am at Your Mercy, Monsieur!"

The small carronade which marked the hour of retreat—eight o'clock—barked at the city hall. At once, slaves and children, soldiers and sailors, must be off the streets of the Vieux Carre. The lazy boom of a war- ship down the crescent bend of the Mississippi answered; and, following the sound idly, the count's eye noted, before the plaza, a long, black, rakish clipper with shining yellow masts, new sails glistening as they hung to dry, and untenanted decks, sweet and clean as a ballroom floor.

"A beauty, that Seraphine!" he mused. "The latest Yankee, out from Boston, cannot match her. Ho, Be- luche! She must make old blood stir in you two adventurers! Aye, turn your envious eyes aside!"

He started at a step on the levee. The gamester of the Bourse de la Maspero had come along the dis- mantled rampart of the fort. Sazarac bowed with a recognizing smile. The bronzed cheeks looked even darker below the whited wig; his eyes had the level, thoughtful humor of the man who laughs behind unreadable reserve.

"You may well say, Monsieur de Almonaster. I have not seen in years a hull so cleanly lined."

De Almonaster glanced at the hand upon the silver sword hilt. The two rotund respectables had seen the tall man in buff and broadcloth, and were hastening. "I see, Monsieur," retorted he, "that, despite your services with the American explorations in the West, you know a ship?"

"I have seen the sea, Monsieur." Sazarac bowed with a searching glance at the younger man. "And you—an eye for a ship is an eye for a woman. . . . I did not expect to meet the Count de Almonaster so far from the fashionable promenade?"

"Nor I to find Captain Lafitte so near again to the Place d'Armes!"

Sazarac studied him gravely: "Your pardon, sir! I think—"

Raoul snapped his fingers laugh- ingly at old Dominique puffing up the levee. Admiral Beluche had drawn a cutlass in fervent salute to his cap- tain.

"Come—come, gentlemen!" Saza- rac's voice raised sharply.

"Thou—Jean!" whispered Domi- nique in the Acadian patois of the coast.

"Lafitte of Barataria. Come, you—sir! Did you think you could tread these streets and not be recognized?" murmured De Almonaster.

The two old adventurers crowded around the stranger. "Now, I am a man again," chuckled Dominique. "And not a clerk drooling over city affairs!" And suddenly, with an affectionate gesture, he lifted slightly the whited peruke above Sazarac's ear. Raven black the hair, tinged with gray. "The beard shaven," droned on old Domi- nique. "The cutlass scar concealed which you got from the Spaniard at Trinidad! And these arms caught you as you fell!"

"And this cut the fellow down!" cried Beluche. "Jean, cease this fool- ing!"

The Captain Sazarac was laughing in turn. His old lieutenants seized his hands, stroked his sleeve, crying out brokenly. Sazarac glanced keenly at young Almonaster.

"No fear," mumbled the alderman. "I have heard this young gallant say but yesterday that he would draw sword in any affair if Lafitte was to command!"

"Aye, for the emperor!" growled Beluche. "The clipper, Jean! Did you ever see a finer? Monsieur Girod brought her from Charleston new from the ways! The finest teak—lacquer tables, tapestries smuggled from Bilboa! All for the fallen em- peror! Perhaps you have heard, my captain?"

"We were saying who so worthy to command as Captain Lafitte?" fumed old Dominique, eager as a boy, "did we not, young sir?"

Sazarac smiled. Raoul interposed: "The plot! Ah, yes . . . the plot!"

"They have built a mansion for him in the rue Chartres—" protested Domi- nique. "Financed the ship—not a first family in all Louisiana that will not have at least a midshipman aboard! But old Bossiere to com- mand—bah! I would balk at it if I had a skin to risk!"

"You might well with the English ring of ships around St. Helena," said Sazarac gravely. "Well, I am Lafitte. I am at your mercy, Monsieur!"

The restless eyes of Beluche were upon a trio of officers from the American garrison who came slowly along the promenade. "Too much talk!" he muttered. "Since that old affair of yours, Jean—the seizure of Galveston island, despite the Presi- dent's pardon, you have long been pro- scribed. As to this emperor—the devil with him! The Seraphine—look at her now! Is she a toy for the dan- dies of this town to play with? A ship—Jean, and a good ship?"

"Eh?" put in Alderman Dominique: "Robber, what's in your mind?"

"The American officers—" retorted the admiral. "Let us be on."

"The Yankees—" murmured Sazara- rac, throwing his silken neck scarf higher as the meeting groups saluted courteously. "When will Louisiana be done with this idea that she is a prin- cipality aloof from the Washington government? The Yankees, gentle- men, are here taking your little Paris."

"They might better have left their manners in the Kentucky woods," said De Almonaster. "And cease meddling in the affairs of Spain across the Sa- bine. You, yourself, sir—what is the feeling in the West?"

Sazarac stopped to look over the darkening river. "It is a far road to Washington. In the Ohios there is gossip. A new republic to be carved from the wilderness, the Spanish provinces to be seized; and among the discontented spirits are the exiled To- ries from the Canadas and the agents of His British Majesty ever watching with jealous eyes. You saw, sir, the affair of yesterday at Maspero's?"

"Colonel Carr, who came with you down-river? I cannot make his mis- sion out as I might wish."

"Nor I. Now and then, on the packet, he boasted of curious things. I recall, one night, a lady warned him to silence!"

"The lady?" De Almonaster smiled.

"Tonight I shall claim my wager from Colonel Carr."

CARE OF VETERANS' CHILDREN

Government Bureau Will Co-Operate With Legion in Plan for Atten- tion to Dependents.

Full co-operation of the children's bureau of the United States Depart- ment of Labor will be extended to the American Legion in the plan for care of dependent children of World war veterans. This assistance to the pro- gram of the Legion on a problem which Legion leaders believe will eventually approximate care of dis- abled, will be rendered in every pos- sible way, according to Miss Grace Abbott, chief of the children's bureau, in charge of welfare work for the government.

Miss Abbott has clearly outlined to George A. Withers, chairman of the Legion's national committee on chil- dren's homes, her ideas of what the veterans' organization should under- take in this work. In the first place, Miss Abbott says that every effort should be bent toward keeping the children of the Legion whose fathers have died, or are incapacitated, with their mothers or near relatives who are willing and competent to care for them. Miss Abbott declares that in the past it has been a common prac- tice to take away children from the remaining parent if means are in- sufficient to care for the dependents. Usually, according to child welfare workers, this operates adversely, causing a double loss to the child. Sometimes a mother is allowed to struggle on under a load obviously too great for her shoulders, and the family becomes demoralized—some- times delinquent. Here, thinks Miss Abbott, is where the Legion posts may help in this portion of the problem by friendly help and care, and by lending assistance in the schooling.

Miss Abbott says that foster homes are generally regarded as better than institutional, if children must be taken from their parents or relatives.

"Such an institution," declared Miss Abbott to Chairman Withers, "should be the last resort after every effort has been made to keep the family to- gether, rather than the beginning of a program. If you could get every post to report to the state department, and in turn to report to national head- quarters as to the success in caring and providing for these children, help- ing families to remain together, in finding ways of providing scholarships for the education of the children, etc., then finally as to the institutional care which may be necessary, I think you would make sure that the Legion children were having the right kind of opportunity for home life, for spe- cial care, if physically defective in any way, and for education, which is their right."

The government welfare worker holds that members of the Legion who are to handle this vital problem for its members should be named from the ablest men in the organization, and that they should approach the question as one which is certain to require diligent study, great expendi- ture of time, and much patience and ingenuity.

LONG FIGHT WON BY LEGION

Federal Judge Killits Holds Foreign- Born Objectors Not Entitled to Citizenship.

Foreign-born men who had conscien- tious objections against serving in the United States military and were ex- empted have been denied citizenship by Federal Judge John M. Killits of Toledo, Ohio. This matter has been the subject of a long and bitter fight by members of the American Legion throughout the country, and officials of the Veterans' organization were well pleased with the action denying to such men the rights of citizenship.

Judge Killits, in his opinion, de- clared that the court was unable to see how any applicant, who, on the grounds of conscience, objected to bearing arms in his country's defense, can take the oath of citizenship with- out reservations and that he, as the court, was unwilling to accept any such oath with reservations to it.

"Without any intention to reflect upon the quality of the profession of conscientious objectors," declared Judge Killits, "we feel that it is enough that the country must endure the native born of that persuasion whose citizenship is a birthright with- out extending the number by the favor of the naturalization laws."

Many posts of the Legion have fought against granting of citizenship rights to such applicants since the close of the war, and, in a number of cases, the fight has been successful. The Toledo instance, however, is be- lieved to be the first decision of a fed- eral court in the matter.

Ohio Is in Lead.

Ohio leads all other states in the number of local voitures of La Societe des 40 Hommes et 8 Chevaux, the "playground of the Legion," though only one-half of the state is organized. The department now has 45 voitures, with Iowa second with 37, Illinois third with 36, Pennsylvania fourth with 31, and New York fifth with 28. The largest voiture of La Societe is in Los Angeles county, California, where the local membership is 316. Polk county, Iowa (Des Moines), is second with 214; Linn county, Iowa (Cedar Rapids), third with 205, and Cook county, Illinois (Chicago), with 204 is fourth. These are the only voitures which number a membership of over 200. Membership in La Societe is based on activities in the organization of the American Legion, and is se- lective.

WHO'S WHO in the WORLD

Hull Succeeds the Late James R. Mann

The Second Illinois Congressional district which sent the late James R. Mann to the house for thirteen consec- utive terms will be represented in the Sixty-eighth congress by Morton D. Hull. It is one of the wealthiest and most populous districts in the United States. It lies in the southeast cor- ner of Chicago, is bounded on two sides by Lake Michigan and by the Illinois- Indiana state line, contains the great industrial plants and steel mills of the Calumet region and has 450,000 inhabi- tants. Mr. Mann was one of the most influential members of the house, a master of parliamentary procedure and a stickler for facts. The first Illinois district, represented by Martin B. Mad- den, chairman of the house committee on appropriations, adjoins the Second district on the north and includes Chi- cago's loop district.

Mr. Hull was born in Chicago in 1867. He was educated in the Chicago public schools and in Phillips Exeter academy and was graduated from Har- vard in 1889 and from Harvard Law school in 1892.

Mr. Hull has been for fourteen years in the Illinois state legislature. His friends "point with pride" to his record. He carried through the house the act requiring the state treasurer to turn over interest on state funds. He championed and secured the passage of the anti-loan shark bill.

Aerial Dare-Devil Again in Limelight

Former Representative Manuel Herrick of Oklahoma just can't keep out of the limelight. While in con- gress he was called the "Aerial Dare- devil" and he narrowly escaped death in one of his flights. Since retiring from the house he has become a de- tective in Washington. Recently Miss Ethel Chrane, a government employee, charged him with disorderly conduct on the street and testimony was given that he used profane language and threatened to get the job of the police- man who made the arrest. Then the "Aerial Dare-Devil" brought suit against Miss Chrane alleging that she promised to marry him and that on one occasion in his office at the capitol she sat on his lap from 7 p. m. to 11 p. m.

Now Miss Chrane comes back with a damage suit for $100,000; she says she didn't sit on his lap. And what's more, she says the "Aerial Dare-devil" is a "gold-digger." And here's the "gold-digging" plot which caused her to break off her engagement with "Lonely Manuel."

The pair, once fond lovers, but now parted in wrath, were to be secretly married, and subsequently to live together very openly. When the newspapers had raised a sufficient number of horrified protests over this defiance of the statutes, all innocent of the fact that the knot had been tied, Manuel was to sue them for enough money to settle the German debts, and the two were to live happily ever after while the publishers tumbled into bankruptcy.

Lawyers Investigating Judicial Ethics

Justice Pierce Butler of the United States Supreme court, chairman of the judicial section of the American Bar association, have been authorized to appoint a committee of judges to pre- pare a code of judicial ethics for ac- tion by the association at its 1924 meeting. A report of the association's committee on judicial ethics which failed of adoption this year w considered by the committee ap ed by Justice Butler. Its ma tures are these:

"A judge's conduct in every ticular should be above reproach. should be conscientious, studious, thorough, courteous, patient punctual, just, impartial, fearless of public clamor, regardless of public praise, and indifferent to private, political or partisan influences.

"He should not allow other af- fairs or his private interests to inter- fere with the prompt and proper per- formance of his judicial duties. A judge should be courteous to counsel, espe- cially to those who are young and inexperienced. He should not act in a con- troversy where a near relative is a party if such course can be reasonably avoided.

Smoot Drafting Expenditure Tax Bill

Senator Reed Smoot of Utah is back from Europe and in his capacity of chairman of the senate finance com- mittee is busy with plans for the Six- ty-eighth congress. After conferring with President Coolidge, Senator Smoot, chairman of the finance com- mittee, said: "We feel sure we will keep the expenses of the government for the next fiscal year well within $3,000,000,000. We should and I be- lieve we will reduce the running ex- penses of the government $200,000,000 the next fiscal year as compared with the present year."

A tax on luxuries and extravagant purchases is the purpose of an expen- diture tax which is being prepared by Senator Smoot to be presented to the next session of congress as a substi- tute for the proposed sales tax. Sen- ator Smoot said that all farmers' sales up to $6,000 would be exempt. Cheap commodities, such as a $3.50 pair of shoes or an inexpensive automobile would not be taxed, but expensive pur- chases, such as a $2,500 automobile or a $7.50 pair of shoes, will be taxable at the rate of 1½ per cent.

"The sales tax, which caused considerable debate at the last session of congress, will not be revived," Senator Smoot said.

SEE WHAT FRICTION DID TO WILLIE'S PANTS

Where two objects are rubbed together there is friction—unless there i s a lubricant to prevent. Willie's pants, when he is sliding, is a common illustration of what friction will do. What friction has done to Willie's pants it will do to even the hardest metal surface, unless a proper lubricant is used.

In your automobile or tractor unless an oil of the proper body that will resist great heat, is used, friction will score the cylinders, piston, rings and other bearings. Carbon also accumulates like slivers in Willie's pants, which retards power and speed. En-ar-co Motor Oil will prolong the life of any motor and save unnecessary repair bills.

You don't cut your oats with a scythe just because it is down, you use the binder just the same. Why not use a McCormick-Deering Picker to pick your corn, even if a few stalks are down. Ask a few bushel pickers now what they will take to pick your corn and you will buy a McCormick-Deering Picker.

MRS. E. M. BARZ DIED AT ATKINS WEDNESDAY

(Vinton Eagle, Sept. 28.)

Mrs. E. M. Barz. a former Vinton girl, died rather suddenly at the family home in Atkins at six oclock Wednesday morning following an illness of a couple of years with diabetes. For some time during the summer she was treated in the hospital at Monticello, and this week the family was packing their household goods preparatory to moving to Monticello, where Mr. Barz is employed in a bank. Mrs. Barz was taken suddenly worse Tuesday, and death followed the following morning.

Mrs. Barz maiden name was Elsie Thompson. She was a daughter of Mrs. R. W. Thompson, who has lived with the Barz family during the past few years, and a sister of Mrs. F. L. Woods and Deane Thompson, of this city. She was born June 10, 1887 at Waverly, Iowa, and before her marriage to Mr. Barz about 10 years ago, was a resident of Vinton. She graduated from the local high school in 1904, and for several years was engaged in teaching school near Vinton and in Garrison, and she followed this work after her marriage. For several years she taught in the Atkins school. She was a splendid woman and her death is greatly regretted by her friends in this city, whose sympathies are extended to the bereaved family.

Mrs. Barz is survived by her husband and litl eson, Max, the mother, sister and brother mentioned above, and another brother, Ira Thompson, of Waterloo.

Funeral services will be held at 1:00 p. m. today, from the Presbyterian church in Atkins. The service will be conducted by Rev. Trimble, of Cedar Rapids, who will be assisted by Rev. F. G. Beyer, of Atkins, and interment will be in Evergreen cemetery in this city.

CORNBELT RATION IS BEST

Shelled Corn, Corn Silage, Alfalfa Hay and Salt More Efficient Than Commercial Feeds—Evvard

Iowa farmers having silage, clover or alfalfa hay and corn grain who are planning to feed out a car of steers this wintor, will do well to stck closely to the "standard cornbelt ration," composed of shelled corn. corn silage, alfalfa hay and salt, according to John M. Evvard, of the animal husbandry department of Iowa State college. "This ration , says Mr. Evvard, "has proved more efficient than similar rations recommended by commercial feed concern that placed their feeds on trial.

In one of these tests, the margin per steer over and above the feed costs for the "standard ration" lot was $20.39. For the commercially fed lots that returned a profit, the margins were from $.05 to $15.91 per steer. One group showed a negative margin of $7.31 per steer.

"Commercially mixed feeds have a field, but the feeder must be careful not to buy what he already has. To purchase a corn substitute is poor practice for him who cribs are filling with cheap corn grain," says Mr. Evvard.

GREIMANN MOTOR COMPANY IN NEW LOCATION

Will Remodel And Install New Fixtures To Give Better Ford Service

A few weks ago the Times made mention of the fact that Aaron Greimann had purchased the fine brick garage building of Henry Beier, then occupied by Ben Coobs as a garage. Tuesday of this week Mr. Greimann purchased all the stock, accessories, tools and other equippment of Mr. Coobs and took immediate posession of the garage.

Mr. Coobs has been in the business for two or three years and has conducted a good business and enjoyed a large patronage. We have not learned just what Ben intends to do, but presume he will remain in Klemme for a time at least.

Aaron Greimann was conducting a fine Ford business until a disastrous fire wiped out his garage about three weeks ago, but he is the kind of young man who has a lot of pep and he at once set about making plans to go after business stronger than ever and that is just what he is now doing.

He is now getting settled in his new location just west of the Creamery and it will be but a short time and he will have everything in fine order. He will do some remodeling and will install a number of new fixtures which will enable him to give high class Ford Service.

He invites you to drop in and is ever ready to talk Ford with you.

OLD FIDDLERS CONTEST

Former Klemmeite Wins Fidler's Contest.

The"Old Fiddlers Contest" held at the Lyceum theatre on Wednesday night, was a decided success, the artists of a generation ago making a real hit with both young and old. Many tourists who attended the performance expressed themselvse as enjoying the contest immensely. So large was the attendance that a "Sanding room only" sign had to be hung out at an early hour.

Cal Newman, a well known old time fiddler, living south of Brainerd, brought the house down with jiggs and reels, jazz music of fifty years ago. He carried off the first prize with no trouble whatever.

E. P. Lound, another old timer with a splendid mellow-toned violin, was awarded second prize.

The audience was asked by Manager W. R. Hiller, to make its decision by applause after each contestant had finished his playing, and the choice for the first and second place was made in no uncertain manner.

This innovation took so well with Lyceum patrons, that the management has decided to stage a similiar contest on Wednesday, Sept. 5th Quite a number of old timers have already signified their desire to compete, and the program promises to be even betted than that of Wednesday's. All fiddlers who desiree to enter the contest are asked to get in touch with Manager Hiller at once.

Many have the idea that only the popular music of today is in demand with the puble, but Manager Hiler, with his old fiddlers, has proven that this is not true. The good old tunes never die, and are listened to by audiences of today with as much interest as the latest song his The Lyceum theatre proposes to assist in reviving the songs of yesterday.—Brainerd, Minn.

ONE RURAL MAIL DELIVERY ROUTE TO BE ESTABLISHED

Establishment of Rural Mail Route Effective November 16

Mrs. Gibbs, postmistress received the following telegram dated at Washington, D. C., Sept. 27, 1923:

"Department has authorized establishment rural route Klemme effective Nov. 16." L. J. Dickinson.

Government red tape is gradually unwinding and the wheels are beginning to move after months of waiting to hear what the Post Office Department would do about the matter of establishing a mail delivery route for rural patrons out of Klemme.

For several years the postmaster, farmers and business men have tried to get a route or two established but they did not succeed.

Finally it was again tried last winter and Cornelius Wille, Albert Fuller and John Larsen got up another petition and spent a great deal of time among the farmers geting their signatures and laying out the proposed route. When the petition was all signed up County Agent L. T. Nutty took a hand in the affair and personally presented it to Hon. L. J. Dickinson, our Representative in Congress, using his influence and explaining to Mr. Dickinson the benefit of the proposed route here. At last a rural route will be established as the above telegram would indicate.

Although the new route is not all we could wish for at least it is the beginning and with one route established we are sure another could be established very easily.

The new route contains one great draw back, and that is that it will serve the rural patrons but three days a week, viz: Tuesday, Thursday and Friday. Department can be persuaded bi-weekly service will not answer the purpose and we are sure a petition from the patrons would soon bring daily mial service.

In a letter to the postmistress the Department outlines the plans of the route, stating that there must be at least 85 families on the new route. The route will be 26 miles long and will be known as Route One. The carrier will receive a salary of $1038 a year. He must depart at 9:45 a. m. and be back at 3:00 p. m.

Mr. Wille gave us the following outline of the route as petitioned:

Route starts at Klemme Post Office, east on Main Street to end of the street taking road south out past Al Whites to the schoolhouse; then east to Arnold's corner; then south one mile to Wm. Smith's farm; east 3 1-2 miles to N. G. Moberly's; then north one mile to the Thieman school house; then 4 miles west to the Klemme corner; the route then goes north of Klemme 1 mile; east 2 miles to Fred Albers; 1 mile north to the Ell Center school house, then 3 miles west to the Wilson Highway and then follows the Wilson Highway south to Herman Priebe's corner when it goes west 1 mile; 1 mile north and then about 1 1-2 miles east again coming into Klemme past the Lau Elevator.

SOY BEANS STAND FROST

Frosted Beans Will Grow If Pods Were Filled

Northern Iowa farmers need not be worried about their soy beans for seed if growth has ben stoppd by fosts before the pods were ripe or before leaves dropped off according to the farm crops section of Iowa agricultural college. It the beans have made their full growth and the pods are full, seed of average germination can be expected, in the opinion of F. S. Wilkins, chief in forage crops at the station.

It is a good plan to let thee beans stand a week or two after they have been killed by frost after which they may be cut with the binder. They may be then left to cure on the ground in the bundle for a day or t . After that they should be shocked in two row shocks with six or eight bundles to a shock. Curing in the shock should progress until the beans are "bone dry." They can then be threshed easily and will make good seed.

NEBRASKA STORM KILLS FOURTEEN

Tornado, Fire and Flood Do Great Damage at Council Bluffs.

OTHER CITIES SUFFER LOSS

Eight Lives Are Lost at Louisville, Neb., Fourteen Miles South of Omaha—Six Other Persons Are Missing.

Omaha, Neb., Sept. 29.—Fourteen persons are known to have been killed in violent windstorms which struck Council Bluffs, Ia., and Louisville, Neb., the latter being fourteen miles southwest of Omaha. Six others are missing and more than twenty injured. Six of those killed were in Council Bluffs and the other eight in Louisville. Omaha itself suffered heavy property damage, but no lives were lost here.

Shortly after the storm struck Council Bluffs, Indian creek, which flows through the center of the city, overflowed its banks and flooded a large part of the downtown section. The rear part of the Strand theater, which is located near the stream, collapsed, but no one was caught in the wreckage.

The downtown section of the city is flooded for more than a mile square. So swift is the current in the streets that spectators rushing to the scene of the tornado were unable to remain on their feet.

A warehouse, several homes, and garages were destroyed by a fire which started soon after the tornado. The fire department, which was called to aid in the rescue of marooned persons, was unable to come within more than half a mile of the stranded persons or the fires. More than an hour after the first alarm of fire was sounded firemen succeeded in getting water on the burning structures.

The composing and press rooms of the Nonpareil, the local paper, were flooded with more than a foot of water.

A mother and three children, boys ranging in age from three to nine years old, were found dead under a tree at Nineteenth and Tostivan avenue, and the father is missing. They were identified as Mrs. Lars Kalstrup, aged forty-five, and her sons, Chester, four; George, seven, and Richard, six. Their house with seven others in the neighborhood was razed.

ROUT REBEL SESSION

Militia Stops Meeting of Oklahoma Legislators in Capitol.

Colonel Key Reads Order of Governor to Assembly in Corridor—Document Calling Special Session Filed in State's Archives.

Oklahoma City, Okla., Sept. 27.—The rebel legislators of Oklahoma failed in their attempt to hold a session of the house of representatives in the capitol in order to adopt a resolution to impeach Governor Walton on a charge of usurping authority by his declaration of martial law.

National Guardsmen dispersed members of the house when they gathered before the entrance to the house chamber and attempted to convene. Adjutant General Markham stood at the door. Col. W. S. Key, military commander of Oklahoma City, halted the attempt to hold a session by reading an order directing the legislature to disperse.

After the attempt to hold a session had failed and the legislators had gone to a hotel to confer, Campbell Russell, a political and personal enemy of the governor, was arrested by the governor's civilian detectives. He was locked up in the city jail on a charge of "disorderly conduct and attempting to incite riot."

When all the rebel legislators were present at the entrance to the house chamber, Charles S. Brice, whom the rebels had chosen as speaker pro tem, raised his hand and began, "Gentlemen of the house—"

The loud voice of Colonel Key interrupted this attempt to call the "house" to order.

"Stand still," he called out, raising a warning hand. And then he read the order.

As Colonel Key's words ended, there was a silence for a moment, the legislators standing indecisive. Then armed officers began moving on them shouting, "Leave the building." And the legislators began leaving.

Before the house members attempted to hold their session, the call for the meeting was filed with Secretary of State R. A. Sneed.

COOLIDGE GETS FARMERS' PLEA

Delegation of Northwest Wheat Growers Tells of Desperate Plight.

THEY ASK EXTRA SESSION

Relief Program Is Submitted to President and Aids at Banker-Farmer Meeting—Want Lower Freight Rates.

Washington, Sept. 28.—A concrete program for the relief of wheat farmers was submitted to President Coolidge Thursday at an important conference of bankers and farmers from the seven northwestern states comprising the Ninth Federal Reserve district.

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, Secretary of Commerce Hoover and Eugene Meyer, director of the War Finance corporation, were in attendance.

The program of aid put before the President by the committee of bankers and farmers embodied the following concrete recommendations:

1. That a government body, preferably the United States Grain corporation, be revived to act as an agency to stabilize wheat marketing and production and that a $50,000,000 fund be appropriated by congress as the capital for such a body.

2. That congress be convened at least fifteen days ahead of the regular session to enact the necessary legislation for this government aid to the wheat farmers.

3. That the agency set up be charged with the duty of segregating the domestic demand for wheat and thus operate to take wheat out of the exigencies in the international market.

4. That freight rates on grain and grain products moving from the producing regions to consuming centers either through voluntary action of the railroads or through edict of the interstate commerce commission be reduced.

President Coolidge gave the committee a very sympathetic hearing and it is certain that the recommendations made to him will receive serious consideration, the more so in view of the fact that it represented the liberal and conservative estimate of the seven wheat states rather than the radical viewpoint.

Bankers Urging Aid to Farmers Only Get Advice

Washington, Sept. 29.—Bankers of northwestern states, who came to Washington to urge President Coolidge to favor legislation creating a wheat marketing corporation, were told by Eugene Meyer Jr, managing director of the War Finance corporation, that the most helpful thing which can be done is for them to develop co-operative wheat marketing associations in their sections.

ETCHEN BROS. BUY RIDDER BLACKSMITH SHOP & GARAGE

Fred Ridder Was In Business Here For Twenty-six Years

An important business deal was closed yesterday when Fred Ridder sold his entire blacksmith and garage business, including the building, all tools and stock of goods to John and Albert Etchen. of this place.

Although a young man, Mr. Ridder is one of the "old" business men of Klemme, having been in the blacksmith and garage business for twenty-six years continuous. He has during that time built up a fine business. A few years ago he put up a fine double cement block building with a blacksmith shop on one side and a garage on the other, and it is one of the best equipped shops in this part of the state.

Until the big fire recently John and Albert Etchen conducted the pool hall. When they closed the deal with Ridder for his business they accumulated one of the most desirable business properties in this city.

John has already taken charge of the business and Albert will move to town later. The boys are both fine mechanics and with the help of Martin Brinkman, whose services they retain, they will be able to turn out a first class job in any mechanical line.

Mr. Ridder has not decided what he will do but says he is going to take a lay-off until spring before he goes into any business.

We wish Etchen Bros. a prosperous business career.

How long will it take to double my savings at 5 per cent interest compounded semi-annually

Of the more than 11 millions of savings depositors in the United States, perhaps only a comparatively small number realize the interest earning power of their savings.

For instance: A saving fund of $500 drawing compound interest at the rate of 5 per cent will at the end of the 18 year amount to $1,140.09, without the addition of a single penny on the part of the savings depositor. Your $500 will have earned in interest, $640.09 during that period.

That is something to think about when you start a savings account for yourself or for your small son or daughter.

CAPTAIN SAZARAC

"I AM MISS LESTRON"

SYNOPSIS—Under the name of "Captain Sazarac," and disguised, Jean Lafitte, former freebooter of Barataria, proscribed, returns to the city of New Orleans. He is recognized by two of his old companions, Alderman Dominique and Beluche. At the gaming tables Sazarac has won much money from Colonel Carr, British officer. John Jarvis, the city's first bohemian of the arts and letters, an old-time friend of Lafitte, tells of a woman's face and smile. As his last wager, Carr puts up a woman, presumably a slave. Custom compels Sazarac to accept the stake. He wins. His old associates and Count Raoul de Almonaster accost him as Lafitte. A project of the youthful adventurers of New Orleans is the rescue of Napoleon Bonaparte from St. Helena, and a ship, the Seraphine, has been made ready.

"I have not seen her, but there was a buzz when she appeared among us. Of an illustrious Tory family, we are told, that fled from New York to Canada after the old revolution. You should know, sir!"

"There were two women—" said Sazarac slowly. "The man took care he was not introduced. I think he assured them I was a common gambler. That, sir, is why I took his measure at the cards—that he put his women to despise me. I am sorry that he forced his game upon me to his own ruin."

"The slave girl!" chuckled Dominique. "They say his lady's maid. I warrant she berated the colonel over using the servant to you!"

"A woman on a card—" rumbled Beluche. "It made me think of old days at Grand Terre—women against gold . . . and the traffic and the rum—e-oh!"

The stranger was watching young De Almonaster sharply. "You are curiously constrained, sir?"

"It is nothing—" Raoul laughed shortly.

"Tell me what was on your lips the moment before!"

"Oh, nothing! The coffee-houses must have their scandal!"

"What then, sir? I have sensed some jest among the tavern drinkers?"

The count shrugged. The two old buccaneers stirred uneasily. They had heard that tone, the tigerish awakening of the master, in days of blood and splintering decks.

"Monsieur," went on Sazarac, as if turning from a mood he wished to put away, "my game was fair. As for the wench, I did not want her. Nor shall I claim her now. The colonel's lady need not fear for her yellow maid."

"In very truth—" blurted De Almonaster. "That is why they laugh! If the gossip is true, Carr's act was that of a poltroon!"

"What is the gossip? That I dare not claim this wager?"

He was upon the young man now, his luminous eyes narrowing fiercely, the line deepening upon his lean bronzed cheeks. Raoul tried to evade him. "Come! They laugh—at what?"

"The tale, sir, runs about the coffee-houses—but I do not, for a moment, credit it—that, on the river trip, your eye was taken by his wife's companion. The latest beauty of our esplanade! And—the story, sir, is out—as a jest, he wagered her against your gold, knowing well—"

The young man broke off as if ashamed to voice the rest.

"Go on!" thundered Sazarac. "You shall prove the word! I win at a toss an unknown chattel! The jest is that I dare not claim the lady's maid!"

"That is not the point, Monsieur. The lady had no maid. The girl in Carr's mind was the one who took your eye upon the packet. Free, white—equal to his wife in station—"

He was silenced by the tense breathing of the older man. Then Sazarac stood quietly back. The two buccaneers were silent at his mood.

"Carr would roar with laughter if you so much as mentioned the debt. Of course he did not dream it would come to the lady's ears—that would be infamy beyond conception. An evil jest of a drunken fool. But, doubtless," added Raoul apologetically, "there is no truth to the gossip."

The captain was gazing at the stars above the river. Old Dominique rubbed his velvet waistcoat. Beluche fingered his sword of Cartagena.

Sazarac at length spoke absently: "About the wineshops they spread the jest?"

"Ah," murmured De Almonaster, "if the story is true!"

"The scoundrel deserves not a challenge, but a lashing from here to the German Coast levee," grunted Dominique; "but no, it is impossible. Go claim your black-faced wench, my captain. The colonel's wife may give you a tongue-lashing, but think how she will scotch him!"

"The wench can lacky around the emperor's suite when we sail—" groaned Beluche sourly. "For I am of a mind that Jean is to command!"

"What nonsense, old dog! I—in such madness!" The captain stared past the schooner's ghostly sails against the stars . . . The Count de Almonaster alone seemed to guess his thoughts and he was silent.

"The Seraphine—" growled Beluche again. "A prettier sight for a sea-dog's eyes never the sun shone on! Fast—unknown in all the ports. Armed to battle the best of them! And Dominique!—think of her slipped away on the heels of the traffic! Name o' God—the fat housecat ships afloat these days when the last black flag has vanished!"

"Ah, me!" sighed the honest councilor. "It was but last October that we hanged three buccaneers in the Plaza—taken off the Belize. I went to the country the day that the three good lads danced on air. It was sad—I drooled three hours over my luncheon. Old days are not so far . . . why, but fifteen years agone we were at the Red house on Grand Terre! But fifteen—and none durst lay a ship in past the guns of our fort, or claim customs on a bale of silks we offered the city! Ah, me—and I am fat—an honest alderman!"

The two old fellows turned to the lost leader. The admiral of Cartagena plucked his sleeve. "A ship—and you cannot linger forever, disguised, in this dull town . . . and I have letters of marque from Colombia as well!"

Sazarac was not listening. Now he turned to De Almonaster as the one who delicately read his thoughts.

"You will challenge, of course—for the lady's sake—" said Raoul.

"Tonight I shall claim my wager from Colonel Carr," answered Sazarac quietly. "Bond girl or free, I will go knock at the gates of hell for her—and we shall see who, of the town, laughs loudest!"

"I recall you won on the ace of hearts," sighed Dominique. "Sazarac wins the lady of the jesting. But Sazarac! . . . Nom de Dieu! What shall they say Jean Lafitte had to do with Sazarac's winning? The American governor would build another scaffold in the Place d'Armes."

"Out of all the deep swamp from Spanish Gap to the Teche you would see old cutthroats pouring to wreck it about his ears—" grunted Beluche. "Black or white, let him seize his winning! Ho, this Sazarac! A good ship, and Sazarac! The wide sea, and Sazarac! Dominique—ho, robber—listen!"

"Be still!" muttered the alderman. "See that policeman by the city lamp? Tut, tut—this will not do—this howling!"

CHAPTER III

The Wager Is Claimed.

The shimmer of a young moon lay in the wide stone arch of the Hotel Orleans on the rue Chartres when, with the abrupt stride and bearing of a soldier, Captain Gaspar Sazarac, late of the American explorations, turned within it. The old concierge arose to greet the cloaked figure.

"Fellow, you will say to the British officer, Colonel Carr, that Captain Sazarac is at his pleasure."

"Oui, M'sieu!"

The old free man of color hobbled up the dim stairs. The visitor stood in the shadows absorbed in the peace of this quiet spot.

But as Sazarac waited he was conscious that someone had stirred across the parterre. The figure of a woman had stepped from the shade to glance up at the old black shambling along the third upper gallery, his ring of rusty keys creaking at his belt.

"Que e la?"

The white-gowned figure started, turning to glance out the arched entrance. The stranger bowed, lifting his hat. He could see her figure grow rigid in the moonlight, her stare became a thing to turn an intruder to stone. At once he knew her—and she him. Sazarac, the unattached and unintroduced gambler of the packet, Marie Louise. The stranger heard her quick indrawing of breath as she looked away, toying with her ivory fan.

"Your pardon, Mademoiselle, for the intrusion. It was by appointment that I came—indefinite, it is true, but at Colonel Carr's request. You are—pardon me—of his family?"

"I am Miss Lestron—the ward of Colonel Carr of Quebec."

He bowed again. He had feared . . . on the packet he had mordantly not taken the trouble to ascertain which was the wife of the English officer. But now there came some surge of feeling he could not explain. He had been stung to folly, that was it—conscious of no other desire, tonight, save to confront Carr, fling an insult at him that no man might endure; challenge and kill him under the oaks of the Bayou St. John road. And now he was gazing on the fairest face that all his adventuring life had shown him. Perfect in the moonlight, the dark eyes cold, scornful; the shrug of her white shoulders above the lace corsage—apparently Miss Lestron had been going to the opera of the Theater d'Orleans, where, he recalled, Rose de Vries appeared tonight in "Le Prophete." But the hour was late for this.

"I think, sir—you cannot see him. It happens—" She glanced up warily at the silent galleries where the concierge was mumbling away ineffectually on his return. "Colonel Carr will not receive anyone tonight."

She turned half from him with an air of dismissal. The stranger bowed once more. His heart was beating with a curious relief. It was plain that the girl did not know of the infamous jest with which all the coffee houses were ringing. He knew now he would pocket the insult; a duel was imposible, for it would drag her name deeper into the mire. Carr had guessed aright; Sazarac could not claim his wager. In a private drinking bout Carr might roar with laughter at the gambler's dilemma; but, for the lady's sake, Sazarac would not challenge; nor would he permit talk of the affair to go about.

He drew his light cloak closer as he turned to go. But as he reached the areaway with its drowsy tinkle of flowing water, he started at a cry that rang wildly through the courtyard, the scream of a negro, and a vengeful shout above.

Turning, he saw the girl in the court staring upward. Then her arms were flung out in appeal. And again that choked cry of a woman, but not in fear—imperious, determined:

"Have done beating the girl! What?—and you strike me?"

Leaping back to stare up, the visitor saw a woman crushed out over the iron lattice rail. The moonlight struck the epauletted shoulder of Colonel Carr, who seemed bent on hurling her to the courtyard. The girl below cried out again hotly. And with a mutter Sazarac sprang past her, up the curving staircase until he gained the third gallery.

The wife of the British colonel was choked and helpless against the railing as the stranger reached them. His hand was upon his sword, but with the other powerful arm he caught the man squarely by the collar, tore him away, flung him headlong against the wall—and then stood quietly, the gilded insignia of His Majesty's Service in his hand. Glancing at the epaulette, he hurled it to the court below. Miss Lestron had followed past the cowering serving-girl bleeding on the staircase.

"Madame—" she cried sharply, "are you hurt?"

"But for this genteman, I had died," the wife gasped, and then checked it with new scorn. Madame Carr stopped abruptly, her eyes upon the unknown gambler of the river packet.

"This," began the girl quietly, "is Captain Sazarac of the American Service. We—must thank you, sir, even for this regrettable aid. You perceive the affair, without doubt—a private matter, of which we entreat—as you are a—gentleman—"

She had hesitated, her dark eyes on him, her lip quivering in the moonlight. A shuffle on the gallery floor; the drunken man was getting unsteadily to his feet. He reeled, grasped the railing, cleared his dazed eyes, and stared.

"Sazarac—bah! Come then, Sazarac, the gambler! Eh—" he lurched forward, and held himself up. "Ho, the porter!—have this fellow thrown out who dares invade my privacy!"

"Lionel!" the wife muttered, and then was still.

Monsieur Sazarac bowed to her quietly.

"What I have done, Madame—I am answerable for. The matter explains itself, doubtless. It shall not pass my lips."

"Sazarac—ruined me," panted the colonel. "A trickster fellow—a sharper of the packet trade—eh, get you within your rooms, Madame!"

"You precede me, sir," she retorted steadily, "you are in no condition to converse."

"Converse? Eh—Sazarac, here? I remember—" he lurched to the rail with hoarse laughter. "An appointment, eh—Captain Sazarac?"

"The matter is settled," commented the other quietly. "You will permit me to depart."

He was passing when the dishevelled officer staggered to the narrow space between rail and wall. "He has come, my—dear, to—ha, ha!—perchance to claim his wager!"

"Sir, you will permit me to pass."

"Not so soon, sir—Captain Sazarac—whoever you are. Ha-ha—it was a stroke—a coup—you will admit that, even if I lost, eh?"

Red-faced, leering, he stumbled nearer, laughing loudly.

"I love you," he said quietly. "You will remember that."

AIR DISARMAMENT BIG TOPIC

Question of International Importance to Be Discussed at Legion National Convention.

The question of an international air disarmament conference will be one of the principal topics for discussion at the American Legion's national convention in San Francisco, according to Legion national officials.

When the Legion started its poll of prominent citizens to ascertain public sentiment in regard to the advisability of holding a conference to limit military air forces in Washington, the question claimed the serious attention of Legionnaires in all departments and a number of state organizations have recommended that the national convention consider the issue.

The Legion believes that world peace is threatened by the unusual air programs sponsored by France, England, Italy and Russia. Led by France, the nations of Europe are involved in a race for air supremacy which the Legion feels may result in a necessity for appropriations of billions of dollars on the part of this country unless an international agreement is reached to reduce air forces.

Public sentiment favors the proposed conference, according to results obtained to date from the poll which elicited replies from members of congress, governors, editors, college presidents and many prominent citizens. Of the letters received, approximately 90 per cent express approval of the gathering.

Through the views of commentators runs a definite current of opinion that the conference should be held as soon as possible and that if it is not held, the United States should take steps at once to obtain thorough protection in air armament. Writers admit the difficulties of obtaining representation at the gathering because of the situation in Europe, but express the belief that the attempt should be made, thereby revealing to the world the nations refusing to co-operate in a movement for world peace.
